

MAZARIN

BY

ARTHUR HASSALL, M.A.

STUDENT, TUTOR, AND SOMETIME CENSOR OF CHRIST CHURCH, OXFORD

London

MACMILLAN AND CO., LIMITED

NEW YORK: THE MACMILLAN COMPANY

1903.

All rights reserved

REVERENDO DOCTISSIMOQUE VIRO

THOMAE VERE BAYNE

A.M.

OLIM HUIUSCE AEDIS

NOSTRARUM HERI FLAGULARUM

CENSORI DIGNISSIMO

ERGA SOLOECISMOS VEL AMICORUM INEXORABILI

AMICOS ERGA

SI QUIS ALIUS

COMI JUCUNDO CONSTANTI

INTRODUCTION

It seems inevitable that Mazarin will always suffer by comparison with Richelieu. The latter, who has been described as the greatest political genius which France has ever produced, appeals to the imagination by the firmness and the success of his policy. The ability with which he managed the foreign affairs of France, and his creation of an administrative system which continued to the Revolution, place Richelieu in the foremost rank of French statesmen. And yet his successor, though less illustrious, equally deserves to stand among those who have contributed most to the greatness of France. What MM. Hanotaux and d'Avenel have done for Richelieu's memory has been done for Mazarin by M. Chéruel. He has made it impossible for us to regard Mazarin as a mere Italian adventurer, or to agree with Michelet that "he was an unprincipled actor, libertine, and gambler, who subordinated every question of State policy to the meanest regard for his personal interests; a miser whose glaring avarice was without a single redeeming quality." It must be remembered that Richelieu advised the choice of Mazarin as his successor, that during the last year of Richelieu's life Mazarin shared that statesman's secrets, and that on the latter's death Mazarin was at once admitted to the Council of State. In M. Cheruel's opinion and in that of all competent historians, Richelieu's choice was fully justified. Unlike Richelieu, Mazarin had an Italian's love of intrigue and diplomacy, and was always confident of his ability to bend his opponents to his will. The history of Mazarin from 1643 to 1661 is not only the history of France, but also the history of Europe. The difficulty, therefore, of writing an adequate biography of him is at once apparent. M. Chéruel's two great works which deal with the period comprise no less than seven volumes, which contain ample materials for forming an estimate of Mazarin's character and work. In that historian's opinion Mazarin was an indefatigable and patriotic minister whose fame principally rests upon his success in making France illustrious by her victories and diplomatic triumphs and in leaving her on his death the leading power in Europe.

The multitude of Mazarinades which appeared, and the brilliant memoirs of the Fronde period, throw interesting side lights on the shifting currents of public opinion in Paris during the stormy years between 1648 and 1653, but as real guides to an appreciation of Mazarin's character and aims they are utterly untrustworthy. More light is cast on the objects of the cardinal's policy and on his literary and artistic tastes by the invaluable collections of his own Letters, by the Inventaire de tous les meubles du Cardinal Mazarin (edited by the Duc d'Aumale), and by the Palais Mazarin by the Comte de Laborde. The perusal of the above will not only illustrate Mazarin's private life, but will fully justify the conclusions arrived at by M. Chéruel. I need from the influence of the pamphlets of the Fronde period, the student of Mazarin's life has now the means of estimating at their real worth Mazarin's services to his adopted country.

As a foreign politician and diplomatist Mazarin has had few equals among French statesmen, and he deserves full credit for his great diplomatic triumphs. The Peace of Westphalia, the League of the Rhine, the English Alliance, the Peace of the Pyrenees, and the Treaty of Oliva form a brilliant list of successes unequalled in the life of any French minister. So fully engrossed was he in the complicated struggle with the Emperor and Spain, that he neglected the internal affairs of France and underrated the strength of the opposition headed by the parlement of Paris. He paid dearly for that miscalculation, though it is questionable if, under the existing circumstances, success abroad was at that time compatible or possible with administrative reforms at home and a policy of severity towards the nobles. Be that as it may, no sooner had the storm in Paris broken out than Mazarin addressed himself with vigour to the task of repressing internal disorder. After a long and weary period, from 1648 to 1653, he succeeded, and the monarchy was once more supreme in France. The last eight years of his life were then devoted to recovering for France that position in Europe which during the Fronde troubles she had temporarily lost. In 1661 he died, having completed Richelieu's internal policy, and leaving that statesman's administrative system in full working order. The destruction of the Hapsburg schemes had also been effected, and on his death Mazarin left France in a stronger position than she had enjoyed at any previous period in her history. Industrious, patient, subtle, and adroit, Mazarin proved to be one of the most sagacious and successful statesmen in French history. He was essentially a diplomatist, and his greatest triumphs were triumphs of diplomacy.

ARTHUR HASSALL

CHRIST CHURCH OXFORD
December 1902.

Milinese—Naples proclaims a Republic—French intervention in Naples—Failure of Guise—Spanish rule restored in Naples—Mazarin's relations with England—The Great Rebellion—Its importance to France—Mazarin's policy—The defeats of Charles I—Mazarin and the Scots—Mission of Bellèvre—Failure of Mazarin and Bellèvre to understand the position in England—The establishment of the Commonwealth a menace to France

Page 22

CHAPTER III

THE PEACE OF WESTPHALIA

1648

The importance of the Peace of Westphalia—Revolutionary movements all over Europe—The situation in France—Military operations after the capture of Dunkirk—Mazarin's foreign policy—The Dutch alarmed at the French successes—The year 1646—Condé in Spain—The Treaty of Ulm—Spanish successes in the summer of 1647—Condé falls before Lenda—The bright prospects of France in October 1647—French failures—The Dutch ally with Spain—Jusmarshausen, Tortona, Prague, Lens—Situation in Paris—The Peace of Westphalia signed—its terms—Brilliant position of France in Europe—Triumph of Mazarin's diplomacy

40

CHAPTER IV

THE PARLIAMENTARY PROBLEM

1618 1619

Growth of discontent in Paris—The conference in the Chamber of St. Louis—Mazarin's neglect of the internal administration—His financial difficulties—A strong hand required—Mazarin's position, 1643 1648—Objects of the leaders of the parlement—How far constitutional?—The battle of Lens—The court's coup d'état—its effects—The barricades—The court yields—Mazarin's plan—The court moves to Leuill—The Declaration of October 22, 1648—Persons for this Declaration—The court in Paris—Hostility to Mazarin—The Mazarinades—Preparations for civil war—Flight of the court—Outbreak of the Civil War—The course of the struggle—Treason of Turenne—The parlement desires peace—The treaty of Rueil Page 51

CHAPTER V

THE EARLY YEARS OF THE NEW FRONTIER

1619-1651

After the Treaty of Rueil—Condition of affairs on the north-east frontier—Treason of Turenne—Return of the court to Paris—The formation of the New Fronde—Influence of the court ladies—Character of Condé—He becomes supreme in the government—Alliance of Mazarin with the Old Fronde—A coup d'état planned by Mazarin—Arrest of Condé, Conti, and Longueville—The court in Normandy, Burgundy, and Guienne—The situation in Bordeaux—Conduct of the parlement of Paris—Return of the court to Fontainebleau—Mazarin with the army—Victory at Rethel—Mazarin returns to Paris—De Retz heads a plot against Mazarin—Release of the princes—Union of the two Frondes—Mazarin retires to Brühl—Unpopularity of Condé—Intrigues of Anne of Austria—Danger from Condé's ambition—The king attains his majority—Position of Condé

CHAPTER VI

THE CLOSE OF THE FRONDE

1651-1653

Rebellion of Condé—The court at Poitiers—Mazarin and Turenne join the court—Campaign on the Loke—Battle of Jureau, Bléneau, and Étampes—The battle of Saint-Ardeine—Condé supreme in Paris—The parlement at Poitiers—Mazarin leaves France—Turenne and the Lorrains—Book XIV. ends: Paris, October 21, 1652—End of the Fronde in Paris—Military operations on the frontier—Book XV. ends—Mazarin's return to Paris—Servien and Fox the parlement of finance—Mazarin wins over the bourgeoisie—His relations with the parlement clergy, and the nobles—The marriages of his nieces—Provence and Burgundy pacified—The revolt in Bordeaux—The Ormée—Its suppression—Triumph of the monarchy—The end of the Fronde—Success of Mazarin's diplomacy Page 96

CHAPTER VII

THE SPANISH WAR AND THE ENGLISH ALLIANCE

1648-1659

Death of the Stadtholder William II—The campaigns of 1651 and 1652—The siege of Dunkirk—Mazarin's negotiations with Cromwell—Failure of Mazarin to grasp the situation—French attempts to relieve Dunkirk foiled—The capture of Dunkirk by the Spaniards—France recognises the English Commonwealth—The loss of Casale and of Catalonia—Fouquet and the finances—The campaigns of 1653 and 1654—Failure of Guise's expedition to Naples—The escape of de Retz—The attitude of Innocent X and of Alexander VII—The rise of the Jansenists—The Provincial Letters of Pascal—Relations of Mazarin with Port Royal—Settlement of the affairs of de Retz—Louis XIV and the parlement of Paris—The campaign of 1655—The persecution of the Vaudois—The Treaty of Westminster with England—The campaign of 1656—Condé relieves Valenciennes—The Treaty of Paris with England—Advantages of the English alliance 116

CHAPTER VIII

THE LEAGUE OF THE RHINE AND THE PEACE OF THE PYRENEES

1658-1659

Capture of Mardyke—Death of the Emperor Ferdinand III—The Imperial election—Mazarin's intrigues—Election of Leopold—The League of the Rhine—The Treaty of Paris with Cromwell—Battle of the Dunes—The siege and capture of Dunkirk—

Criticism in Paris—Negotiations with Spain—The proposed Savoy marriage—Treaty with Spain—The Peace of the Pyrenees—Marriage between Louis XIV. and the Infanta arranged—The Northern War—The Peace of Oliva—Mazarin and Turkey—The English Restoration—A marriage arranged between Princess Henrietta and Orleans—Triumph of Mazarin's diplomacy Page 136

CHAPTER IX

MAZARIN'S DEATH, CHARACTER, AND WORK

Mazarin's illness and death—His will—Success of his diplomacy—Compared with Richelieu—A summary of his policy during and after the Fronde—His character—His artistic tastes and his library—His patronage of literature—His ignorance of financial matters—The services of Fouquet—His employment of middle-class officials—Le Tellier, Servien, Lionne, Colbert—The intendants—Check upon the parlement of Paris—Mazarin's neglect of agriculture and commerce—His education of Louis XIV.—The debt of France to Mazarin—A great diplomatist 159

IMPORTANT DATES 179

APPENDICES

A.—PRINCIPAL AUTHORITIES	183
B.—THE MAZARIN FAMILY	184
C.—THE GENEALOGY OF LOUIS XIV. AND OF THE GREAT CONDÉ	185
D.—THE PARLEMENT OF PARIS	186

CHAPTER I

THE EARLY YEARS OF MAZARIN'S MINISTRY

1643-1646

Youth of Mazarin—His employment by Richelieu—Death of Richelieu and of Louis XIII.—Mazarin First Minister—The situation in France—Rocroi—Rise and fall of the Importants—Policy of the great nobles—Strength of the government—Financial difficulties—The opposition of the parlement of Paris—The battles of Düttlingen, Freiburg, Mergentheim, and Nördlingen—The war between Sweden and Denmark—Mazarin's diplomacy—The Peace of Brömsebro—Results of Nördlingen—The failure at Orbitello—The capture of Dunkirk—Mazarin's position in 1646 and 1647—Arrival of some of his relations—Necessity for a vigorous foreign policy.

RICHELIEU died on the 5th of December 1642; on the following day Louis XIII. announced that he had chosen Mazarin to be First Minister. Giulio Mazarini, or Jules Mazarin, as the French call him, was born on July 14, 1602, at Piscina, a small village in the Abruzzi. His father was a certain Sicilian, by name Pietro Mazarini, his mother was Hortensia Buffalini, who was renowned for her beauty. To the latter the young Giulio owed much of his future success, for it was due to her efforts that he first studied under the Jesuits at the Roman mother and to Mazarin, who, while endeavouring till the outbreak of the Fronde to preserve internal peace, was always jealous of any attacks on the royal prerogative. In her attitude of constant watchfulness over her son's rights Anne was ever loyally supported by the cardinal whom the parlement regarded with reason as its principal foe. The parlement had expected that Anne would prove pliable and carry out its wishes. Before long however the queen mother definitely indicated the position which as regent, she intended to adopt, and from that moment the rift between the parlement and the government became deeper and deeper.

On the evening of May 18, the queen mother announced a decision which proved to be a momentous one in the history of the French monarchy. Mazarin was confirmed in his position as First Minister, and the hopes of the parlement were disappointed. The work of consolidating the French monarchy was not to be interrupted and the policy of humbling the Austro-Spanish house was to be continued.

Hatred of Richelieu as First Minister had been general among the noble class during the greater part of Louis XIII's reign. Anne's announcement presaged the continuance of a system of government which was odious to the feudal as well as to the legal aristocracy. The disaffected therefore at once resolved to resist the rule of Mazarin and a system of uncompromising opposition to the supremacy of an Italian adventurer was organised.

The situation of France was at this time extremely critical. Richelieu's death already had disastrous effects on the military administration and energetic action on the part of the government was necessary. Ammunition was deficient, supplies of all kinds were with difficulty forthcoming, and the bonds of discipline had been seriously relaxed. While the ranks were weakened by frequent desertions, general officers had left their respective posts, and many of the subalterns were absent from their duty. It seemed very doubtful if the army of the North would be able to take the field. Equally serious had been the effects of the death of the great cardinal on the stability of the government. Many persons imprisoned or exiled by Richelieu now returned to Paris, and were ready to avenge their wrongs on his successor. Anxious to secure pensions and offices, they were wanting in political responsibility, and cared nothing for the welfare of France. The return of these exiles rendered Mazarin's position unspeakably difficult, and forced him for a time to adopt a policy of compromise.

The issue was, however, plain. Was the work of crushing the great nobles, and of making French influence supreme on the Continent, to be continued? Was the French monarchy to symbolise the unity of France? Mazarin embodied the continuance and development of Richelieu's policy. He consistently aimed at abolishing feudalism and making the monarchy supreme. Consequently, he at once became the object of bitter attacks. All those who disapproved of Richelieu's policy immediately ranged themselves in opposition to Mazarin, and resolved to abolish the post of First Minister. For some ten years the internal development of France was checked, while the feudal and legal aristocracies endeavoured to regain their lost positions, to reverse the foreign policy of the last two reigns, and to destroy Mazarin. In consequence of the cessation of Richelieu's drastic methods the nobles and parlement did succeed in plunging France into confusion, and by their action fully justified the measures by which they were ultimately suppressed. The new policy of leniency and concession in place of that of stern repression was, however, seen after a few years to have failed in every respect, but it was not till 1653 that Mazarin was able to remedy the evil results of the easy rule of Anne of Austria from 1643 to 1648, and of his own neglect of the internal administration.

Mazarin, during the first years of his ministry, found himself in a very difficult position. Unlike Richelieu, who was supported by the king, Mazarin could only rely upon a woman and a child, and Anne of Austria, by her good nature and desire to satisfy everybody, made a stern policy for the time impossible. Opposed to him were "powerful rivals and redoubtable enemies," and while he had the management of the kingdom placed in his hands, his work was continually hampered by the acts of the queen mother's friends, who, hitherto exiled and disgraced were returning in large numbers to France. Fortunately he was able to unravel the various plots formed against him in France, while his intimate acquaintance with the political state of Europe stood him in good stead in directing the foreign policy of the kingdom. Before the first surprise occasioned by the confirmation of Mazarin in his post as First Minister had worn off came the news of the decisive victory of Rocroi. Nothing could have happened more opportunely for the minister. The government was strengthened, its enemies confounded, and the early years of the reign opened in brilliant fashion. Mazarin had fortunately confirmed the Duke of Enghien, son of Prince Henry of Condé, in the command of the army of the North. His genius for war not being at the time generally known, the veteran l'Hôpital was chosen to guide and control his actions. On assuming the command, Enghien's ascendancy was at once felt. He restored the discipline and confidence of the army and made preparations for taking the offensive. The Spanish army, however, under Mello, forestalled his intentions, and as a preliminary to the invasion of France, and to a march upon Paris by the valleys of the Marne and the Aisne, the Spanish general besieged the small fortress of Rocroi. Putting aside l'Hôpital's plea for caution, Enghien, ably supported by Gassion, a cavalry leader of great promise, rapidly advanced, and on May 19, 1643, the famous battle of Rocroi was fought. The Spanish army, which included many Italians and Walloons, numbered 27,000, against their opponent's 23,000. At first the French left wing was driven back and the victory of Spain seemed assured. But Enghien's dash and skill restored the fortunes of the day, and he won a decisive victory over the renowned and experienced troops opposed to him. For the first time in a hundred years, Spain suffered a defeat at the hands of France. Until the fatal day of Blenheim the ascendancy of French arms in Europe was established. Thionville was at once besieged, and, owing to Enghien's engineering skill, surrendered on August 18. These successes strengthened the hands of the minister and enabled him to deal an overwhelming blow at the cabal of the Importants, who, headed by the Duke of Beaufort, were conspiring to bring about his downfall.

The conspirators—who included the Duchess of Chevreuse, Richelieu's old enemy and the most famous political schemer of the day, the Bishop of Beauvais, an intriguer of the first water, "the most idiot of idiots", Montésor, "who had the outside of a Cato, but none of his virtues", the Duchess of Monthazon and the beautiful Duchess of Longueville, two clever and unscrupulous court ladies, the Duke of Beaufort, and the rascally Abbé de la Rivière—had determined to play upon Anne of Austria's good nature, to destroy Richelieu's system and change his policy, and, in a word, to seize the government. Mazarin himself was alive to the hatred which pursued Richelieu's memory, and counselled toleration of all opinions. "Time," he wrote, "will avenge that great man of all these insults, and those who blame him to-day will find out hereafter, perhaps, how much his guidance would have been necessary to complete the happiness of the realm—the happiness of which he has laid the foundation. Let us then suffer the malice of ignorant and prejudiced minds to evaporate freely, since opposition will only serve to irritate it." These broad minded views failed to conciliate the Importants, and when the Duchess of Monthazon was exiled for insulting the queen Beaufort resolved to have the cardinal assassinated. The plot failed, and on September 2 Beaufort was arrested, and the Importants virtually ceased to exist. This vigorous action on the part of the government was received with general satisfaction. "The whole population," wrote Mazarin, "was overjoyed." It was now clearly manifest that, though Mazarin's courtesy and gentleness bore a striking contrast to the domineering manner of his predecessor Richelieu himself was no less resolute than the Italian cardinal. Men recognised that Richelieu's mantle had indeed descended on Mazarin. "Il n'est pas mort: il n'a que changé d'âge," was the first line of a rondeau composed after the coup d'état of September 2, 1643, in which it was wittily suggested that Mazarin was Richelieu himself.

Though the cardinal was now firmly established in power, and supported at court by many devoted friends, such as Antoine, Marshal of Gramont, René-Potier, the Count of Tresmes, Roger du Plessis, the Marquis of Liancourt, and others, he had many serious difficulties to face. The Duke of Orleans and the Condé family were mutually jealous and desirous of securing important provincial governments. Henry Condé demanded Languedoc for himself and the estates of Chantilly and Dammartin,—in fact, the whole of the domains of his brother-in-law, Henry of Montmorency. Enghien was to have Burgundy; and as the Duke of Longueville, Condé's son-in-law, was governor of Normandy, it was evident that acquiescence with demands such as these would prove highly detrimental to the development of the French monarchy. Orleans, on his part, demanded Champagne with Sedan. Cardinal Richi had advised Mazarin to bring about an understanding between Orleans and Henry Condé, and to rule by their means. Mazarin, however, made no attempt to carry out this suggestion. He preferred the safer plan of playing them off the one against the other; and for carrying out this policy he was by nature remarkably well suited. By giving Languedoc, on which Condé had set his heart, to Orleans, he preserved the friendship of the latter and stirred up strife between the two families. All through the year 1643 the provincial question had occupied his mind The increase in taxation, and the severity and dishonesty of the methods of collecting taxes, had caused great discontent in the country districts, and in the autumn of 1643 the peasants of Rouergue rose, and their example was shortly afterwards imitated by the people in Lower Poitou, Santonge, and the Angoumois Langeron, to whom had been committed the duty of suppressing the rising, after meeting with serious resistance, put down the revolt in Rouergue with an armed force, but in the other districts the nobles themselves took part in the risings, and a state of things somewhat similar to that then existing in England was created A small army was promptly sent to the disturbed districts, but measures of severity were rarely employed, and a general amnesty was granted By this mixture of firmness in suppressing disorder and of humanity in sparing the people, Mazarin succeeded by the beginning of 1644 in restoring order in the provinces Like the Norman kings, Mazarin had fully realised that it was politic to be generous to the mass of the nation, who would be if well governed, a source of wealth to the crown "The queen's absolute intention, he wrote to the intendant of Languedoc, is that every possible facility may be given to the people to pay the subventions which the inevitable necessity of public affairs compels Her Majesty to require from them Meanwhile other but not less effective measures were being taken to ensure the stability of the government Believing that the influence of the episcopacy was used against him and fearing lest the queen should be affected by it, Mazarin ordered some sixty two bishops to return from Paris to their dioceses

The cardinal's triumph over the nobles, the bishops, and the court ladies was due in great measure to his personal influence with the queen. At the time the strength of this influence was never suspected, and Mazarin's fall was confidently anticipated. The secret of this influence was for two centuries a source of difficulty, but from Michelet's time historians of high authority have accepted the view that Mazarin and Anne of Austria were united by marriage. Mazarin had early gained not only the admiration, but also the affection of the queen-regent. To this affection was due the fidelity with which Anne adhered to the fortunes of the cardinal during the whole of the Fronde period. To this affection were due the earlier and later triumphs of Mazarin. Being only in deacon's orders, Mazarin, though a cardinal, could lawfully marry.

So far the anxieties of the government had been the natural outcome of the changes consequent upon the deaths of Richelieu and Louis XIII. The initial difficulties of the new reign had been overcome and the rule of Anne of Austria and of Mazarin had been apparently firmly established. It remained to bring the war to a successful conclusion. To effect this desirable end, large supplies of money were absolutely necessary. Richelieu had left the finances in a desperate condition. The system of farming the taxes was a most ruinous one, and it was only by borrowing at an exorbitant rate of interest that funds could be procured. In 1644 the expenditure had risen from 99,000,000 livres in 1642 to 124,000,000, of which 59,000,000 never reached the treasury. It was necessary to raise money, and during the contests of the government with the parlement of Paris not only were the glaring defects of the French financial system made apparent, but many points of comparison between the situation in England and that in France could be observed

Early in 1644 Particelli d'Emery, the dishonest controller general of finance, imposed a tax of forty sous on every toise of land built upon, outside the walls of Paris. The inhabitants affected appealed to the parlement, and a contest arose between that body and the government. Simultaneously in the provinces riots took place against the imposition of certain taxes. The danger of a general uprising all over the country was a real one, and before it the government recoiled. It was resolved to withdraw the edict of the toisé, and to substitute a taxe des aises which would not fall on the poorer classes. By this tax Emery expected to obtain about forty millions. But the parlement, on the suggestion of Omer Talon, the advocate general, demanded that the whole of the legal class should be exempted from the operation of this measure. As many others also obtained exemption, it resulted that upon the farmers of the revenue would fall the full force of the exaction. This necessary but unpopular class at once raised a great outcry. If they were abandoned by the court they would no longer furnish the required supplies. The public credit would be ruined and the government would be helpless. Recognising that the numerous exceptions had destroyed the utility of the tax, Emery at once withdrew it, and in March 1645 reimposed the toisé. The opposition which this measure provoked was so violent that Anne arrested and exiled some of the members of the parlement. In an interview held previously, Anne had silenced the President Gayant with the words, "Taisez vous ; je vous connais vieux fou." In spite of the energy shown by the government, Mazarin recognised the existence of deep discontent in the country. Had it not been for the victory of Enghien and Turenne at Nördlingen in August 1645, an early outbreak of the Fronde might have taken place. The victory, however, enabled the court to adopt a bold attitude, and Mazarin hoped that other successes such as that won at Nördlingen would enable him to make a satisfactory peace, to be followed by the establishment of order and prosperity in France.

After the Rocroi and Thionville campaign, a force under Rantzau had penetrated into Germany, where it was defeated at Düttlingen by Mercy, the Austrian general. That reverse was, however, compensated for by the French success in three desperate battles at Freiburg in 1644, where Turenne and Condé both showed great skill. By the end of 1644 French armies were in occupation of the Rhine Valley. In 1645 Turenne, like Villars in the Spanish Succession War, made an attempt to unite with the Swedes in a concerted advance upon Vienna. Ragotsky, Prince of Transylvania, had been won over by Mazarin, and had engaged to aid the Swedish general Torstenson, while Turenne marched on Vienna through Swabia. Unfortunately for the success of the scheme, Turenne, on May 5, 1645, was defeated at Mergentheim, and Torstenson was incapacitated by illness. Reinforced by Enghien and eight thousand men, Turenne avenged the check which he had received by aiding his brilliant colleague to win the battle of Nördlingen on August 3. In this desperate struggle, in which both sides suffered heavily, Mercy was killed, but so severe were the French losses that, though the road to Vienna lay open, Turenne was unable to advance. Moreover, as Ragotsky and Torstenson, who had recovered from his illness, had both retreated, and as Englishen was ill, it would have been folly to have moved forward with a weakened force. As it was, however, the reputation of the French arms was fully re-established, and the hands of the opposition, exultant after Mergentheim, were weakened.

A few days after the battle of Nördlingen, Mazarin had achieved a valuable diplomatic success. Since the beginning of 1644 Sweden and Denmark had been at war—the result of Austrian intrigues at Copenhagen. Torstenson and Horn thereupon invaded Denmark, leaving France to bear the weight of the struggle in Germany. This diversion of the Swedish forces tended to prolong the war against the Hapsburgs, and Mazarin hastened to intervene at Copenhagen and Stockholm in favour of peace. He was supported by the presence of a Dutch fleet in the Baltic, preliminaries of peace were signed at the end of the year 1644, and Torstenson returned to Germany with his troops. Under the mediation of the French ambassador, la Thuillerie, conferences between the Danish and Swedish envoys were opened at Bromsebro. Influenced by the successes of the Swedes in Germany and Bohemia where, in April, Torstenson defeated the Austrians at Jankowitz, and by the determination of the Dutch to support Sweden, Christian IV of Denmark consented to the proposed terms, and on August 14, 1645, the Treaty of Bromsebro was signed. France had not only brought about peace, but had secured definite territorial advantages for her ally.

At the same time Mazarin recognised the advantage of conciliating Denmark, and on November 25, 1645, he made a treaty with that power advantageous to French commerce. He also endeavoured to strengthen the French alliance with Poland and Transylvania, and spared no pains to gain for France the position of protectress of the German princes and German liberties. The military successes of Turenne and Enghien in Germany, of Gassion and Rantzau in Flanders, and of Harcourt and of la Mothe-Houdancourt in Spain, tended to place France in the first rank among the European powers. This position had been won by an unpopular Italian cardinal, who, while conducting complicated negotiations, and superintending distant military operations, was engaged at home in a continuous struggle with a violent and unpatriotic opposition, and with increasing financial difficulties. Taking advantage of the victory of Nördlingen, Mazarin determined to strike a blow at the opposition without delay.

On September 7, 1645, a few weeks after Nördlingen, a lit de justice was held. The parlement adopted a submissive tone and registered nineteen financial edicts, creating many new offices and taxing various trades; while the government wisely withdrew the toisé and the taxe des aises. Mazarin had triumphed, but his triumph was mainly due to the opportune victory of Nördlingen. This success gave the government three years of breathing-time, during which the opposition of the parlement to the minister increased. For the moment, however, Mazarin had won a distinct success. His power increased, and he was given the duty of superintending the education of the young king. In spite of his momentary triumph over his enemies, the opposition to the minister grew steadily during the years succeeding the battle of Nordlingen. Mazarin was continually attacked both openly and covertly by his enemies. Even Orleans, influenced by such men as Louis d'Astarac, the Marquis of Fontrailles, one of the most dangerous characters of the day, and by the ambitious Duchess of Montbazon, took up an attitude of opposition, which, while not a serious danger, tended further to increase the difficulties of the government.

More dangerous was the hostility of Henry of Condé. His hatred of Mazarin had never ceased, and he now took advantage of the battle of Nordlingen to demand for his son Enghien the sovereignty of Charleville sur Meuse. On Mazarin's refusal, Condé took every opportunity, in conjunction with the Count of Chavigny, to oppose and hamper the minister. At the same time Paul Gondy, coadjutor of his uncle, the Archbishop of Paris, began his celebrated career of hostility to Mazarin and to the French government. Richelieu would have cut short these numberless intrigues by arrests and executions. Mazarin met them by dissimulation. An adept himself in the art of intrigue, he eventually defeated his enemies with their own weapons. But the opposition was so widespread, and had now, by the leniency of the government, been allowed to become so powerful, that there is little doubt that, in spite of Nordlingen and other victories Mazarin would have been driven from France had he not continued to possess the full confidence and affection of the queen regent. If, as has been taken for granted, the cardinal and Anne of Austria were united by a secret marriage, it is easy to explain the constant support which Mazarin received from Anne. In 1646 the intrigues continued. The French, on June 14, had been defeated at Orbitello, and the defeat had given the signal for renewed attacks on the minister; while Enghien's capture of Dunkirk later in the year, so far from strengthening the government, only served to render more emphatic the contrast between the plans of the minister and those of the general. Attacks on Mazarin and the queen were circulated; the period of Mazarinades had definitely begun. Ignoring these anonymous publications, Mazarin now took steps to check his enemies. Orleans, who had returned to Paris in September 1646, after the capture of Mardyke, was not again given a command; Henry of Condé was treated with quiet contempt, and not allowed any active share in the administration.

The siege of Mardyke was only an operation preliminary to the more important siege of Dunkirk. Mazarin's heart was set on its capture, which he hoped would prove to be the first step towards the conquest of the Spanish Netherlands. He spared no pains to attain success. He conciliated Enghien; he increased the army in Flanders by recruits from Ireland, Scotland, and Poland. To his expenditure of time and money was due the fall of Dunkirk, for without Mazarin's elaborate preparations Enghien's brilliant military qualities could have effected nothing. The majority of the leading officers in the French army regarded the enterprise as hopeless, but Mazarin never lost heart, and his views were readily accepted by Enghien, whose optimism was usually justified. Mazarin rightly attached great importance to the action of the Dutch. A diversion by the stadtholder would have most beneficial results, and a large portion of the Spanish army would be held in check. Unfortunately, the stadtholder fell ill at the moment, but after some delay the States General decided to take the offensive, and, as Mazarin had anticipated, a portion of the Spanish forces was detached to watch the Dutch. In September 1646 Dunkirk was isolated. The Dutch fleet under Tromp prevented any reinforcements from entering the port of Dunkirk, and Tromp was joined by fifteen French ships. The Spaniards were helpless. To the English parliament they appealed for aid, but England was in the throes of civil war and neither party could spare troops to assist Spain. The success of Mazarin's foreign policy during these years was in great measure due to the continuance of the Civil War in England. One of the cardinal points of English policy was to watch with jealousy any advance of the French towards Flanders. Had England been under a settled government, there is no doubt effective aid would have been given to the Spaniards, and Dunkirk would not have fallen into French hands. As it was, the English parliament though much excited at the prospect of the French capture of Dunkirk, could do nothing, and Enghien pressed on his attacks upon the town. Its governor, the Marquis of Leyde, was a brave man, and his defence of Dunkirk forms one of the most famous episodes in the war. He was only equalled in courage and recklessness by Enghien, who perpetually was in danger of losing his life. At last a portion of the ramparts was destroyed by a mine and a breach effected. Further resistance was rendered useless. On October 11, 1646, the garrison marched out of Dunkirk with all the honours of war, and Rantzau was made governor. The capture of Dunkirk proved most advantageous to France, for hitherto it had been a nest of pirates who preyed on the French merchantmen. The Dutch did not, however, view Enghien's success with tranquil feelings. The inhabitants of Zealand feared that their commerce would suffer from the competition of Dunkirk, and were not reassured by Mazarin's promise that, during the continuance of the war, at any rate, the French government would not be able to think much about trade. The capture of Dunkirk, though it proved to be the first step towards the rupture of the Dutch and French alliance, remains a glorious exploit on the part of Enghien, and reflects immense credit on Mazarin's preparations and diplomacy.

Notwithstanding the check at Orbitello in Italy, the year 1646 was a fortunate one in the history of the minority of Louis XIV. In the Netherlands the Spaniards had lost Courtray, Mardyke, Furnes, and Dunkirk; in Italy the French had occupied Piombino and Porto Longone. Over Poland, Sweden, and Denmark, French influence was supreme. In spite, however, of the general success of the French arms and diplomacy, the hostility to Mazarin never ceased, and any check to his policy was greeted with joy. All the elements of the Fronde struggle were being rapidly accumulated, and every detail of Mazarin's private life was seized and enlarged upon by his enemies. His avarice and his care for his relations gave opportunities which his opponents were not slow to use, while his foreign origin always rendered his position in France a difficult one.

From 1646 onwards Mazarin definitely began to amass wealth, and to use the advancement of his relations as a means of strengthening his own position in France. In 1647 he forced the Pope Innocent X. to make his brother, Michel Mazarin, a cardinal, and in the same year his nieces and nephews began to arrive in France in order to share the fortunes of their uncle. One of his sisters had married a Martinozzi, and had two daughters, the other, Signora Mancini, had no less than ten children. In 1647 Anna Maria, the elder of the two Martinozzi children, and one son and two daughters of Signora Mancini, well known later as Laura and Olympia Mancini, arrived at Fontainebleau and were carefully educated. Their arrival was at once made the subject of many satirical Mazarinades which appeared during the years of the Fronde. Each of the three nieces eventually made a brilliant marriage. Anna Maria Martinozzi married the Prince of Conti, brother of Enghien, while Laura Mancini married Louis of Vendôme, Duke of Mercœur, and eldest son of the Duke of Vendôme, and brother of Beaufort, and Olympia Mancini became Countess of Soissons, and mother of Prince Eugène.

Between 1645 and 1647 Mazarin had to watch every movement of his enemies. Intrigues were the order of the day, but the intriguers found themselves outmatched by the cardinal, whose position was gaining in strength. Moreover, he had successfully broken the union between Orleans and Enghien by stirring up the jealousy which was always latent between the families of Orleans and Conde. As the king's uncle and lieutenant-general of France, Orleans held a position of influence. But he was weak and fickle and Mazarin had great difficulty in keeping him loyal to the true cause. He, however, fully realised that it was only by decisive successes abroad that a satisfactory peace could be secured which would leave his hands free to deal with his enemies at home. Till that peace was made he was forced to play a waiting game, to balance between parties, and to use intrigue and corruption when forcible measures were required. The French armies held the key of the situation, and Mazarin rightly left no stone unturned to win brilliant and decisive victories.

At the end of 1646 the capture of Dunkirk had strengthened the French military position. If a telling blow could be struck at the Spanish power in Italy, it was likely that Spain would realise the futility of further resistance, and would agree to the conditions of peace which Mazarin as minister had seriously put forward through the French representatives early in 1646.

CHAPTER II

MAZARIN'S CONNECTION WITH THE REBELLIONS IN NAPLES AND ENGLAND

1643-1649

Italy in 1643—Spain and her decadence—Mazarin's policy in Italy—Election of Innocent X.—The Tuscan presidii—The siege of Orbitello—Masaniello's revolt in Naples—Its causes—Death of Masaniello, rise of Annesi—The French attack on the Milanese—Naples proclaims a Republic—French intervention in Naples—Failure of Guise—Spanish rule restored in Naples—Mazarin's relations with England—The Great Rebellion—Its importance to France—Mazarin's policy—The defeats of Charles I.—Mazarin and the Scots—Mission of Bellièvre—Failure of Mazarin and Bellièvre to understand the position in England—The establishment of the Commonwealth a menace to France

WHEN Mazarin succeeded Richelieu, Italy was still a geographical expression. The Spaniards held the kingdom of the Two Sicilies and the Tuscan ports, and were supreme in the Milanese. The war of Castro between the papacy and a league of princes—a war the outbreak of which had fatally interfered with Richelieu's Italian policy—continued, and was not concluded till 1644. Divided, and lacking all national feeling, Italy was destined to remain a prey to intrigue and open to attack till the pertinacity of the house of Savoy was rewarded, and Italy, in the latter half of the nineteenth century, became a nation.

Mazarin had not been long in office before he determined, in continuance of Richelieu's policy, to hamper the Spaniards by taking advantage of the chronic discontent in Italy, and to attack either the Milanese or the Tuscan ports. At the same time he took every opportunity during the struggle with Spain to stir up the Neapolitans to revolt. Though the gains to France from Mazarin's Italian policy were small, none the less there is something to be said for a policy which hampered Spain for many years and occupied large bodies of her troops.

Spain during the 'Thirty Years' War had good reason to regret the policy adopted by Charles V. and his successors at Madrid. Instead of attending to the true interests of their country, the Spanish rulers attempted to rule over the Spanish Netherlands and Italy, and involved themselves in all the dynastic schemes of the Austrian Hapsburgs. The interests of the Spanish population were never considered, and the vast Spanish colonies in America were badly managed. Throughout the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries the national well-being of Spain was subordinated to dynastic considerations. The Peace of the Pyrenees found Spain in a state of decadence, unable to defend the Spanish Netherlands from attack, with her hold on Italy growing weaker each year, and the vision of an Atlantic empire rapidly passing away. Mazarin rightly concentrated his principal attacks upon the Spanish Netherlands.

From that quarter Paris was most easily threatened, and the loss of the Low Countries to Spain would be not only serious to her reputation, but would prove an immense gain to France. As a means to that end the intervention of France in Italy, and the constant attempts of the French fleet to dominate the western basin of the Mediterranean, have a special interest.

In the Milanese, Tuscany, and Naples, Mazarin simply continued the policy of Richelieu, and devoted all his efforts to secure if not the expulsion from, at any rate the weakening of the hold of the Spaniards upon Italy. But the same influences which checked Richelieu's attempts to carry out his schemes were at work during Mazarin's ministry, and till the end of the Spanish Succession War Italy remained dominated by Spain. By the formation of a new Italian League, which should include the Pope, Venice, Florence, Parma, and Modena, Mazarin hoped in 1643 to oust the Spaniards from Milan. But as long as the Spaniards held the Tuscan ports the Grand Duke of Tuscany was unwilling to take any action, and on the death of Urban VIII his successor, Innocent X, quarrelled with the French cardinal. Nevertheless, though unable to form a league, Mazarin never ceased to stir up opposition to Spain in Milan, in Tuscany, in Naples, and in Sicily. His agents were to be found in many parts of Italy inciting the Italians to throw off the Spanish yoke and to replace it by national governments. Nothing perhaps illustrates better Mazarin's tenacity of purpose and patience than the way in which he allowed no obstacles to check, more than temporarily, the execution of the anti-Spanish policy in Italy, which he carried on consistently till 1648. On July 29, 1644, Urban VIII. died, and the Spanish party among the cardinals succeeded in carrying their candidate, the Cardinal Panfilio, who was elected in September as Innocent X. Mazarin was furious. The French envoy Saint-Chamand was replaced by Grémonville, who, it was hoped, would successfully counteract Spanish influence at Rome. The task was a difficult one. Innocent X. repelled the French advances and declared himself in sympathy with the Spanish cause. His actions confirmed his words, and Grémonville was recalled.

Though Mazarin had failed at Rome, he pursued with energy schemes for the overthrow of the Spanish power in Italy, and at once resolved to conquer the Tuscan presidii or ports, and then to proceed to the conquest of Naples itself. The Tuscan ports included Orbitello, Porto Ercole, Porto San Stefano, Telamone, Monte Argentaro, Monte Philipppo, and Porto Longone in Elba. Before attacking any of these places, Mazarin fixed upon Prince Thomas of Savoy as the French candidate for the Neapolitan throne. The prince came to Paris, and it was agreed that, in the event of his accession to Naples, he should hand over to France Gaëta and another port on the Adriatic. "Mistress of the presidii of Tuscany, of Gaëta, and of a port on the Adriatic, and closely allied with the new king of Naples, France would have ruined the Spanish influence in Italy."¹

These well-prepared plans were destined to be unsuccessful. The French fleet sailed from Toulon on April 26, 1646, and Orbitello, with the help of Prince having compassed the death of Masaniello on July 16, 1647, the Duke of Arcos reimposed the former taxes and a fresh revolt burst out. This time the rising was directed against the Spanish rule, and was an attempt on the part of the people to secure independence. Like the Dutch in the preceding century, the insurgents looked abroad for assistance in their struggle against the power of Spain, and by the advice of one Gennaro Annesi they appealed to the Duke of Guise, who was then in Rome. Mazarin was in 1647 not unwilling to seize this opportunity of hampering the Spanish court. "No enterprise," the cardinal wrote, on hearing of Masaniello's rising, "could be more useful to France." He was well aware what the loss of Naples and Sicily would mean to Spain. "The loss of two kingdoms," he said, "would be the mortal blow to that monarchy." But Mazarin's habitual prudence inclined him to act with caution. French expeditions to Italy since the days of Charles VIII had been conspicuously unsuccessful, and the Neapolitans were proverbially fickle. It was quite likely that the appearance of a French fleet off Naples might lead to a reaction in favour of Spain. At last, after much hesitation, Mazarin proposed to place Condé at the head of a French army which should be sent to Naples. Condé, however, refused. Mazarin had hoped that Condé would be tempted to take part in a Neapolitan expedition in the hope of becoming King of Naples. The motives which prompted Condé's refusal are unknown. His failure at Lerida may have checked his love for distant expeditions, he may have suspected that Mazarin wished to induce him to accept what was practically banishment.

¹ Chéruel, Hist. de France pendant la minorité de Louis XIV., ii. 175.

After Masaniello's death and Cardillo's refusal to head an expedition to Naples, Mazarin, with justifiable caution, allowed some months to elapse before he took any decided action. In the meantime he collected troops at Piombino and Porto Longone, and he organised, under Francis d'Este, Duke of Modena, with whom an alliance was signed on September 1, 1647, an attack on the Milanese. The conquest of the duchy of Milan would, he expected, rally round France the princes of Mantua, Parma, and Tuscany. As soon as the Neapolitans had definitely broken with Spain and had demanded aid from France, it would be time enough to send them reinforcements. In October the invasion of the Milanese took place, but failed to accomplish anything decisive. Francis d'Este was unfitted to lead an expedition, being irresolute and timid. The Spaniards fortified Cremona, and the Duke of Modena was unable to advance further. As a set-off to this check in North Italy, Mazarin could now hope to win some striking success in Naples. There the perfidy of Don John of Austria, an illegitimate son of Philip IV. and commander of the Spanish fleet, had roused the people to fresh rebellious acts. Having promised to carry out the conditions granted by the viceroy after Masaniello's death, he proceeded to treat Naples as a conquered town. Reprisals followed, and Gennaro Annese was placed at the head of a republican government which was proclaimed on October 24, 1647. A definite breach had now been made with Spain, and the Neapolitans appealed to France for aid.

Mazarin's anticipations were fulfilled, and, ignoring his previous resolve to make Prince Thomas king, he decided to intervene in Naples with a fleet and an armed by his cruelty. The King of Spain at once took advantage of the unpopularity of Guse. A new viceroy the Count d'Onate was appointed, who entered into negotiations with Gennaro Annesi, and a plot was arranged for the overthrow of Guse. Convinced that the French duke intended to rule without his aid, Gennaro suddenly, on April 6 1648, betrayed the city to the Spaniards and Don John of Austria took possession of the kingdom. Both Naples and Sicily were treated with great severity by the Spaniards, Gennaro was executed and Guse was imprisoned for many years in Spain.

There never had been any adequate reason for expecting that French intervention would lead to any solid result, and Mazarin who well knew the Italian character, was well in hesitating before taking in 1648, any further important action. Had Guse succeeded in establishing himself, there is little doubt that the cardinal would have supported him and an expedition was actually being prepared for the spring of 1648. As it was, France had enough on her hands nearer home without seriously weakening herself by distant expeditions on behalf of a fickle and untrustworthy ally. The tax on fruit was not reimposed, and the kingdom of the Two Sicilies returned to its habitual slumber.

Nor was Mazarin more successful in his relation with the English Royalists. The English Civil War broke out in 1642 and continued till 1648, and during its continuance English influence on the Continent was practically suspended. Though French policy was in no way interfered with by England the course of the struggle between the Royalists and Parliamentary was watched with interest in France. Not only was Henrietta Maria a French princess, but the development of republican opinions in England, as in Holland and Naples, was always viewed with apprehension by Mazarin. Occupied at home by the increasing strength of the opposition, and abroad by the exigencies of a great war, Mazarin was unable seriously to consider the question of sending assistance to the cause of Charles I. It was in his opinion an advantage to France that the English nation should be fully occupied at home.

In 1644 Queen Henrietta Maria arrived in Paris. The cause of Charles I. was not flourishing in England, and Henrietta hoped to procure French assistance. Mazarin, however, showed no eagerness to involve himself in English affairs. Goring, the English ambassador, had associated himself with the Duchess of Chevreuse, and Mazarin naturally feared the intrigues of Henrietta's following. Besides, he had his hands full. France was amply occupied with the struggle with Spain and Austria, and her resources were taxed to the uttermost. In the summer of 1644 Turenne and Condé had defeated the Imperialists in the battle of Freihurg, and the Rhine Valley from Basle to Bacharach was in French hands. The war, however, showed no signs of coming to an end, and all Mazarin's efforts were devoted to crushing his foes. It is doubtful if, under any circumstances, he would have given Henrietta any effectual assistance. He had no wish to see England strong enough to interfere on the Continent, and he seems to have never wavered from his desire to keep England weak. He was therefore willing, in order to perpetuate the divisions in England, to intrigue with the Irish and Scots, and for

CHAPTER III

THE PEACE OF WESTPHALIA

1648

The importance of the Peace of Westphalia—Revolutionary movements all over Europe—The situation in France—Military operations after the capture of Dunkirk—Mazarin's foreign policy—The Dutch alarmed at the French successes—The year 1646—Condé in Spain—The Treaty of Ulm—Spanish successes in the summer of 1647—Condé fails before Lerida—The bright prospects of France in October 1647—French failures—The Dutch ally with Spain—Zusmarshausen, Tortosa, Prague, Lens—Situation in Paris—The Peace of Westphalia signed—Its terms—Brilliant position of France in Europe—Triumph of Mazarin's diplomacy

THE Peace of Westphalia constitutes an important epoch in the history of Europe. It marked the close of the struggle in Central and Northern Europe between the Reformation and Counter Reformation movements, and the failure of the attempt of the Emperor to form all Germany into an Austrian and Roman Catholic empire. After the Peace of Westphalia, commercial rather than religious motives regulated the policy of the chief states of Europe. But the peace did not merely mark a revolution in men's ways of thought, it also signalised a remarkable change in the balance of forces on the Continent. For upwards of a century the Hapsburgs, supreme in Vienna and Madrid, and closely united by family ties, had threatened to impose their will upon Europe. After 1648 the danger ceased. The weakness of the Emperor and the strength and independence of the German princes rendered any close union with Spain impossible, while Spain herself, though she struggled till 1659 against her impending fate, was already a declining power.

From another point of view the Peace of Westphalia has a special interest. It affords an admirable illustration of a successful effort on the part of the German princes to strengthen their own position at the expense of the central power. All over Europe the monarchical principle was being assailed. In Holland the power of the stadtholder depended entirely on the will of the merchant aristocracy; in England a republic was shortly to be established; in Italy the revolt of Masaniello seemed at one time likely to lead to the formation of a Neapolitan government independent of Spain; and even in Russia aristocratic discontent against the tsar existed. Thus the movement in France against Mazarin, which shortly developed into the Fronde struggle, was but one of many similar manifestations of a general tendency all over Europe to attack monarchical institutions.

Mazarin was well aware of the impossibility of checking the general disaffection in France till Austria had been humbled, and therefore he devoted all his efforts to bringing the war to a successful conclusion. The actual congress was not opened at Münster till April 10, 1644, and it was not till the end of 1645 that the influence of an evil constellation. Nor did the opening of 1648 give any indication of decisive French successes. In January the Dutch made a definitive treaty with Spain, while the Elector of Bavaria, who in October 1647 had taken up arms against, renounced the Treaty of Ulm.

The situation at the beginning of 1648 was thus far from being encouraging. Mazarin, however, never lost hope or relaxed his efforts. The failure of Condé at Lens had been followed by the issue of a vast number of satirical attacks upon him, and the cardinal, Paul de Gondy, the poet Sarrasin, the Comte de Piesque, and the Bishop of Rennes were especially conspicuous in the virulence of this hostility to the government. Nor was the parlement of Paris idle, it seized the opportunity of testifying its opposition to the minister. Energetic measures were at once taken to relieve the situation. To Condé was given the command of the army in Flanders, vacant by the death of Gassion, while Turenne was ordered to attack the Duke of Bavaria, and the Marshals Plessis Praslin and Schomberg were entrusted with operations in Italy and Spain.

In May the combined Franco-Swedish forces under Turenne and Wrangel won the battle of Zusmarshausen, and Bavaria was invaded. At the same time another Swedish general, Königsmark, entered Bohemia and threatened Prague. The Emperor was thus attacked both from the west and from the north. In Paris, which was seething with sedition, the victory of Zusmarshausen was little noticed, though Mazarin fully appreciated its importance, and had little doubt that the Emperor would be compelled to make peace. But before this desired end was attained he had to live through many anxious months. In Italy the operations were disappointing. Plessis-Praslin won no decisive success in the Milanese, and no satisfactory opportunity for successful intervention in Naples presented itself. Nor were the first beginnings of Condé's campaign in Flanders promising. Courtray was lost in May, and it was expected in Holland that the French would not be able to keep possession of their conquests.

In July, however, the tide turned. On the 13th of that month Schomberg captured Tortosa, and Spain lay open to a French advance. On the 26th a still more important success was gained, which brought into clear relief the value of the victory of Zusmarshausen. Königsmark, the Swedish general, cleverly seized Little Pragne, that portion of Pragne which was situated on the left bank of the Moldau. It was the capture of Little Pragne which perhaps more than any other event induced the Emperor to listen to the advice of the Duke of Bavaria and of other German princes, and to agree to peace. Hardly had Mazarin heard the news of these successes when the Duke of Châtillon arrived with the welcome intelligence of Condé's defeat of the Spaniards on August 22 at Lens.

Rarely has a victory been won at a more opportune moment, and the debt due to Condé by the French government was immense. The French had, earlier in the year, lost Courtray, and had failed to take Ostend, and the Archduke Leopold, a commander of ability, had pressed forward to the line of the Somme. Condé, at the head of a very inferior force, lacking supplies, pay, and ammunition, was opposed to him, and on his success

Like Louis XVI in 1789, the queen mother endeavoured to prevent the meeting of the deputies. Like Louis she failed in her object, and the court was forced to yield. The Spaniards had taken Courtray, and it was well to temporise. Money was urgently needed, and Mazarin hoped, by appealing to the patriotism of the parlement, to obtain the requisite supplies. He represented that the conduct of the parlement strengthened the cause of Spain, and ruined the credit of France. Unless money was forthcoming it would be impossible to keep up the French armies, or to maintain order at home. Catalonia would have to be abandoned, the alliance with Sweden and Hesse would be broken off in a word, all would be lost. The parlement, however, was dead to all sense of patriotism, and was prepared to sacrifice the nation to its own petty interests. Orleans, who had joined the malcontents, promised that the deputies who had been imprisoned or exiled by Mazarin should be restored. Mazarin, hoping for some striking success on the frontier, determined to temporise, and on June 30, 1648, in open defiance of the orders of the government, the Chamber of St Louis was constituted as a permanent political body to carry out reforms. With its establishment the First or Parliamentary Fronde began its stormy career.

In appearance the parlement of Paris was like the English parliament, bent on securing valuable constitutional rights. Its members demanded proper control of the taxes, liberty for the individual, the abolition of lettres de cachet. But in doing so they were encroaching upon the rights of the States General, which was the only representative assembly of the French nation. And, moreover, it was soon evident that the parlement aimed primarily at securing its own privileges. Each step in the struggle between the parlement and the crown brings out more conclusively the selfishness of the lawyers and their lack of statesmanship. In the New or Second Fronde the nobles made no pretence of securing for the nation constitutional rights. They openly demanded provincial governments, pensions, and gifts of money. Thus the principal cause of the failure of the Fronde movement was apparent from the first. The parlement had no constitutional basis; its opposition to Mazarin, which was in many respects justified, was tainted by the egoism and selfishness of its members. It had in reality no great aims; it had no hold on the people. As time went on the movement was rapidly wrecked by the intervention of the nobles and court ladies. De Retz was under the influence of the Duchess of Chevreuse; the Duke of Beaufort was governed by the Duchess of Montbazou; Condé revealed all his plans to the Duchess of Châtillon, who conveyed them to Mazarin; Turenne was encouraged in disloyalty by the Duchess of Longueville. There was no lack of ability on the side of the opposition; Molé and de Retz represented talents of different qualities, and the latter remained the most brilliant pamphleteer of the period. Rochefoucauld, who at one time was under the sway of the Duchess of Longueville, gives ample evidence in his Maximes of consummate ability and of a profound knowledge of human nature; while Turenne and Condé, who at the period were united against the crown, were the two ablest generals of the day. Among other conspicuous men of the day who opposed Mazarin, Chavigny and Châteauneuf were perhaps the most dangerous. But the association of

that he would not uphold the royal cause. Being determined at the first opportunity to resist the pretensions of the parlement, and being desirous to sound the loyalty of Condé, Anne and Mazarin summoned the prince to Paris. It was probably arranged at some interviews which took place on July 19 and the following day that the prince should first crush the Archduke Leopold and then return to aid the government in overcoming the resistance of the parlement.

Till Condé had won a decisive victory the government thought it well to continue to temporise, and Anne of Austria simulated a desire to satisfy all the demands of the Frondeurs. On July 31 a royal declaration agreed to the majority of the claims made by the Sovereign Courts in the Chamber of St Louis. No satisfactory guarantee was, however, given with regard to the personal liberty of the subject, and Broussel and other extremists continued to agitate. The situation, which in many respects resembled that of 1792, remained critical, the Frondeurs desiring further radical changes, while the court anxiously awaited developments on the frontier. At last, on August 22, 1648, arrived the news of Condé's victory at Lens.

"Heaven has at last declared in our favour," wrote Mazarin "in the Low Countries no less than in other places." The victories of Zusmarshausen, Tortosa, and Prague had now been crowned by the victory of Lens. The superiority of the French arms was proved, and the court prepared to crush the opposition of the parlement. The success at Lens would in Mazarin's opinion enable him to force Spain to make peace, and to triumph over the parlement. By the advice of the Count of Chavigny, the King's Couneil—which included, besides the queen-regent and Mazarin, the Dukes of Orleans and Longueville, the Chancellor Seguier, and Meilleraye, the superintendent of the finances—decided, like the court of Louis XVI. in July 1789, to carry out a coup d'état and to arrest three members of the parlement, Broussel, Blanmesnil, and Charton. The arrests were to take effect in August. On August 26, the day on which a Te Deum was being sung in Notre Dame in honour of the victory at Lens, the attempt to carry out the coup d'état was made. Unlike Charles I. in his attempt to arrest the five members, the action of the French government was partially successful. Charton indeed escaped, but Broussel and Blanmesnil were seized. The populace of Paris at once rose, and erected barricades. The whole city was in an uproar. The news that Masaniello had headed a rising in Naples against the tax-gatherers helped to excite the mob, just as the victories of the English parliament had encouraged the aspirations of the French parlement. At this point Paul de Gondi, better known as the Cardinal de Retz, the intriguing coadjutor of the Archbishop of Paris, became prominent. He appeared at the Palais-Royal and advised the queen-regent to yield to the popular wish and release Broussel and Blanmesnil. Having failed in his object, he set to work to inflame still more the passions of the multitude. On August 27 the situation became yet more serious, and the Chancellor Seguier, attacked by the mob, nearly lost his life.

The parlement endeavoured, at first without success, to induce Anne to release the prisoners; but at length, yielding to the advice of Orleans and Mazarin, she consented to a compromise. The parlement agreed not to interfere in political matters, and Broussel and Blanchemesnil were released. The barricades disappeared, and outwardly Paris was pacified.

But all danger was by no means over. The Duke of Longueville had during the troubles held a very ambiguous attitude and it was evident that he and other nobles were not loyal to the court. The troops had shown signs of mutiny, the days of the League seemed likely to return. On August 29 Mazarin made certain suggestions to the regent which testified to his foresight and determination. He was resolved to restore the royal authority, and to subdue the parlement. He was determined to enforce the supremacy of the king in Paris, and till that had been accomplished the reputation of France would suffer abroad, trade would languish, the conclusion of the war would be deferred. Like Mirabeau, Mazarin recognised the necessity of removing the king and court from the influence of the capital. He therefore advised the departure of the court to Rueil, Conflans, or Saint Maur, where the return of Condé could be awaited. On that general's arrival Paris could, if necessary, be coerced by force of arms. Meanwhile he urged the adoption of temporising measures, and of a policy of conciliation, with the object of dividing the enemies of the royal authority. Many of the bourgeoisie were opposed to the late seditious conduct of Paris, and the older members of the parlement were disposed to peace. But a powerful party in the parlement was determined to regain its political powers, and on the instigation of de Retz held meetings in order to consult upon the necessary measures to be taken. Moreover, the Count of Chavigny had deserted the cause of the court and urged the parlement to resist Mazarin to the uttermost. It was obvious that a further collision between the royal authority and the parlement was inevitable.

Mazarin's mind was made up. On September 13 the court moved to Rueil, where it was joined by Orleans, Segnier, Meilleraie, and Condé. Two of the cardinal's opponents, the Marquis of Châteauneuf and the Count of Chavigny, at once felt the heavy hand of the minister. The former was exiled; the latter was placed under arrest. The attempt of a deputation of the parlement, headed by its president, Matthieu Molé, to secure the release of Chavigny and to induce the queen-regent to return to Paris, failed, and the King's Council annulled the decree of the parlement itself. The parlement prepared to take defensive measures, but the outbreak of hostilities was averted by the temporary triumph of a pacific spirit in the court. It is difficult to account for this sudden change; it was probably due to the fact that Mazarin could not depend upon the whole-hearted support of Condé in carrying out an energetic policy. Condé indeed stood apart from de Retz and looked with contempt upon the "long-robed" parlement as much as he did upon the canaille. Like Napoleon he scorned mob-rule and disorder. But for years he had been alienated from Mazarin, and hated him as much as he despised the Frondeurs.

Yielding to the persuasions of de Retz, Condé advocated the assembling of a conference, hoping to bring about Mazarin's exclusion from its meetings. The conference first met at Saint-Germain on September on the part of Turenne, Mazarin was able to devote his energies to the task of subduing Paris. There, on January 12, the mob had seized the Arsenal, and had secured possession of the Bastille. Two days later, on January 14, Beaufort occupied Charenton, important as facilitating the entry of provisions into Paris. Possessed of Charenton and of the town of Brie Comte Robert, the Parisians could feel secure from all danger of being starved into surrender.

In spite, however, of these successes, and of the continual efforts of de Retz and Beaufort, the Parisian levies proved no match for Condé's regular troops, before whom they fled on January 23 and again on January 29. These reverses, together with the loss of Charenton on February 8, encouraged the party of moderation among the clergy and the members of the parlement to raise their voices in favour of peace. The people in Paris were becoming weary of the war, resented the sufferings to which they were subject, and complained of the conduct of their generals. From being a determined stand for liberties and reforms, the war was already showing signs of degenerating into a mere selfish struggle on the part of the nobles against the centralisation of the royal power, and especially against Mazarin.

In many respects the siege of 1649 foreshadowed that of 1870. There was the same levity and anarchy, the same endurance and courage. Condé and Moltke both experienced similar difficulties in their attempts to subdue the French capital. Through the influence of de Retz negotiations were entered into with Spain, and a Spanish envoy arrived in Paris. But a reaction had begun, and the moderate party in the parlement protested against dealings with Spain. The clergy favoured a settlement, and the news of the execution of Charles I. shocked the consciences of the more reasonable men on both sides. The loss, too, on February 25, of the town of Brie-Comte-Robert increased enormously the difficulty of securing supplies. Though de Retz remained master of the Parisian populace, and intractable, and though the nobles of the Fronde stood aloof, moderate counsels prevailed, and on February 28 the parlement decided to send deputies, who should treat not with Mazarin, but with the court. The interests of the royal cause demanded a settlement, even though of a temporary character. Turenne was still anxious to march to the aid of Paris, the Archduke Leopold was ready to invade France, and some of the French governors of frontier towns were intriguing with the Spaniards. Concessions were therefore advisable. On March 11 a compromise was patched up, known as the Treaty of Rueil. But in Paris the terms were refused. The extreme members of the parlement were furious when they realised that Mazarin was to remain in power, and that, till the end of 1649, the parlement was not to discuss political questions. It was not till April 2 that the treaty, slightly modified, was accepted, and the twelve weeks' war came to an end. The right of the parlement to take some part in State affairs was reluctantly allowed by Mazarin, and the treaty was registered; the Parisian troops were then disbanded. But the main object of the Frondeurs, the expulsion of Mazarin from France, remained unfulfilled, and the people and nobles regarded the treaty with no enthusiasm. Though, however, the

the besieging army. By seizing the supreme power he had reduced the king to a puppet, and rendered himself unendurable to the queen-regent and Mazarin. The great nobles of France were jealous of the influence and power grasped at by Condé, who had in vain supported the Duchess of Longuevilles attempt to secure for two of her friends the labourel, or right of being seated in the queen's presence. An uneasy period ensued in which the prince endeavoured to render his position independent of the crown, and in which his insolence and tyranny became more and more accentuated.

He had mortally offended Anne of Austria, he had alarmed the parlement, which realised that it had less to fear from the court than from Condé and his following. He was disliked by the citizens, and, what was of immediate importance, he was not supported by de Retz.

The coadjutor, who during these times played so brilliantly the rôle of party leader, would willingly have ousted Mazarin from his position. Unable to carry out this wish he had posed as a mighty demagogue, and was proud of his influence over the Paris mob. Fearing the tyranny of Condé, he was now prepared to unite with Mazarin in delivering the court from the new danger which threatened it. In January 1650 Mazarin determined to free himself and the court from the man who not only had extorted terms which made him virtual master of France, but who was now inciting the parlement of Bordeaux to rebellion and was endeavouring to secure a hold upon Normandy. Fortunately, as we have seen, Condé, by his arrogance, had broken with de Retz, Beaufort, and generally with the Old Fronde. Mazarin, who was supported by Orleans, and who had won over Beaufort by elaborate promises, was thus able to effect a union with de Retz, to whom a cardinal's hat was promised.

A coup d'état was planned and carried out. On January 10, 1650, Condé, Conti, and Longueville were arrested and shut up in the château of Vincennes. The parlement made no objection, Paris remained quiet, the authority of the regent was restored. In alliance with the Old Fronde Mazarin had temporarily checkmated the New Fronde. But the friends of the imprisoned princes at once endeavoured to raise rebellion in the provinces, and in this work the influence of women was very apparent. In fact, throughout the New or Second Fronde the influence of the great court ladies is often more effective than that of the men. The Duchesses of Longueville and of Chevreuse, Mazarin once said, could overthrow ten States. The former (Condé's sister) now endeavoured to raise Normandy; but failing, fled to Stenay, where she met and stirred up Turenne to fresh unpatriotic acts.

Mazarin had little difficulty in establishing the royal authority in Normandy. On February 1 the court proceeded to that province. Dieppe yielded, and after some negotiations the Duke of Richelieu gave up Havre. That worthy was the grand-nephew of the great cardinal, and his wife, Anne Poussart du Vigean, was entirely in the hands of Condé and the Duchess of Longueville. By his marriage Richelieu had fallen under Condé's influence, and it had been feared that he would refuse to yield Havre. The grant of the tabouret to his wife, however, removed all difficulties, and a heavy bribe led to the submission of the château of taken severe measures and suppressed by force of arms the faction in Paris? That was the view of Lionne afterwards celebrated as a diplomatist, and now one of Mazarin's supporters. At the beginning of 1651 Mazarin could adopt one of two courses—either reconciliation with one of the two factions opposed to him and with its aid to overthrow the other or the declaration of war upon both. There are indications that Mazarin strongly inclined to the latter course—that he relied on the army to suppress the factions which troubled France. Before however declaring war upon de Retz and his followers it would be necessary for the queen to leave Paris. Unfortunately, Anne of Austria was laid up with an illness which had attacked her at Poitiers and again at Amboise. Mazarin himself wrote to Servien that he was prevented from carrying out the second alternative which was the best, ‘par une fatale qui a rendu la reine malade dans cette conjoncture et hors d’état de pouvoir pénétrer de plus d’un mois tenter ce coup.’ His enforced hesitation at this crisis had disastrous results. Before he could build up a national party and suppress the factions by force of arms, Paris and Bordeaux experienced revolution and a period of civil war.

During January 1651 while Mazarin hesitated his enemies, headed by de Retz, acted with decision. The parlement declared itself openly and strongly in favour of the princes and the two Frondes united. Mazarin who had thought himself after Rathenau able to vanquish the two Frondes, L’Ecluse calculated his strength. He now appears to have been somewhat taken by surprise and adopted no decisive measures. The link which bound him to Orleans was finally broken on February 1, 1651, when the duke, who had joined de Retz and Beaufort in declaring that the liberty of the princes was necessary for the welfare of the State, stated to Anne of Austria that the Frondeurs were simply attacking the deplorable policy of Mazarin. The cardinal, on the other hand, said that the Frondeurs, like Fairfax and Cromwell, wished, while attacking the minister, to destroy the royal power. Recognising, however, that hostility to himself was the bond of union between the two factions, Mazarin decided to withdraw. On February 6, 1651, he left Paris. The queen having been prevented on February 9 from following his example (her attempt somewhat resembling that of Louis XVI. in 1791 to go to Saint-Cloud), she was compelled to give orders for the release of the princes. On hearing this news, Mazarin at once proceeded to Havre, and on February 13 set the princes at liberty. He apparently hoped, though in vain, to gain their gratitude. In March he left France, and from April 11 to the end of October he lived at Brühl. During this period he was in constant communication with the queen, le Tellier, Lionne, Servien, who were, with Nicholas Fouquet, his most trusted supporters. Under his direction Anne of Austria carried on a ceaseless war with her enemies, and by following his advice was able to triumph eventually over her foes.

"The return of the princes to Paris was a veritable triumph," and was followed by measures for perpetuating the victory of the aristocracy over the monarchy. The parlement at once annulled all declarations directed against any of Condé's supporters, and a small com-

CHAPTER VI

THE CLOSE OF THE FRONDE

1651-1653

Rebellion of Condé—The court at Poitiers—Mazarin and Turenne join the court—Campaign on the Loire—Battles of Jargues, Bléneau and Étampes—The battle of Saint Antoine—Condé supreme in Paris—The parlement at Pontouse—Mazarin leaves France—Turenne and the Lorrainers—Louis XIV enters Paris, October 21, 1652—End of the Fronde in Paris—Military operations on the frontier—French successes—Mazarin's return to Paris—Servien and Louquet superintendents of finance—Mazarin wins over the bourgeoisie—His relations with the parlement, clergy and the nobles—The marriages of his nieces—Provence and Burgundy pacified—The revolt in Bordeaux The Ormée—Its suppression—Triumph of the monarchy—The end of the Fronde—Success of Mazarin's diplomacy

AT the time of the celebration of Louis XIV's majority (September 7, 1651) the Kings Council included Orleans, the Marquis of Châteauneuf, who always hoped to be Mazarin's successor, Molé, and la Vieuville, superintendent of the finances. While Mazarin remained at Bruhl, Condé, with his brother Conti, Nemours, Rochefoucauld, and Viole, was at Chantilly. Already, influenced by the Duchess of Longueville, he had decided on rebellion, and the political situation of France seemed to favour his plans. Oliver Cromwell, successful in England, was disposed to foment troubles in France, if not actually to seize some of her northern ports. Spain was bidding for an English alliance.

In the south Condé was received with enthusiasm, and the families of la Force, la Rochefoucauld, la Trémoille, and Rohan embraced his cause. Daugnon, who held the fortress of Brouage, and was governor of La Rochelle, and who hoped to form La Rochelle, with Ré and Oléron, into an independent principality, supported him. Condé's schemes were extensive. He proposed to carry the war to the Loire, to effect a junction with the Duke of Nemours, who commanded troops in the north of France, while Turenne, supreme at Stenay, would march through Champagne and perhaps occupy Paris. The crisis was serious, for France was still split into a number of selfish, unpatriotic factions, while the almost universal hatred of Mazarin was a serious obstacle to the development of the tendency towards the triumph of the monarchy. At first the Council showed unexpected vigour. On September 26, 1651, Louis XIV. and the court left Paris for Fontainebleau, and in October proceeded with a small army into the province of Berri. Success attended the efforts of the king's party. In Saintonge, where Harcourt commanded, Cognac was relieved (November) and La Rochelle was seized, while in Berri the king occupied Bourges and established the royal authority. The court then proceeded to Poitiers. By the end of the year a considerable step had been taken towards the suppression of the rebellion. All danger from Lower Poitou had disappeared, and Daugnon had made terms with the court. Condé's decrees during that period, including those attacking Mazarin, were annulled

Orleans retired to Blois and ceased to be of any political importance, and his daughter 'Mademoiselle' was exiled to Saint Fargeau. The Duchesses of Montbazou and Châtillon were also compelled to leave Paris, and Châteauneuf was ordered to retire to Berry. On October 22, the day after the return of the court, Louis held a lit de justice, and forbade the parlement of Paris to take any part in affairs of State. Beaufort, Broussel, and nine other prominent members of the parlement were banished and it was seen that no effective resistance was possible. The Bastille was next secured, and on December 19 de Retz was arrested and imprisoned in Vincennes. As far as Paris was concerned the Fronde movement was over.

The return of Mazarin was, however, absolutely necessary. The foreign policy of France demanded his presence. The relations of the government of Louis XIV with England, Germany, and Italy required careful handling and French interests abroad were suffering through the absence of the cardinal. The Spaniards had in October regained Barcelona and Casale, and had secured the alliance of the Duke of Mantua. Oliver Cromwell's attitude had become so threatening that Mazarin had persuaded Anne of Austria, in spite of the opposition of Henrietta Maria, to recognise in December the English Commonwealth and to send Bordeaux as ambassador to London. France was also in continual danger from invasion on her eastern border, where Condé had in November seized Chateau Porcien, Rethel, Sainte Ménehould, Bar le Duc, Ligny, and the town of Commercy. In December, however, Mazarin succeeded in bringing reinforcements to Turenne, and Bar-le-Duc, Ligny, and Commercy were easily regained by the French. Mazarin was now ready to accede to the wishes of the queen-mother, the king, and Servien, and to return. On January 12, 1653, Châteaun-Porcien was retaken by the French, and at the end of the month Mazarin left the army and proceeded to Soissons. On February 3, 1653, in company with the king, who had met him some miles outside the city, Mazarin entered Paris.

The state of the finances required Mazarin's immediate attention. On January 2, 1653, la Vienville, the superintendent of finance, had died, and Nicholas Fouquet immediately applied for the post. Other applicants appeared—Servien, Molé, and le Tellier. Mazarin came to a characteristic decision. Richelieu had laid it down that it was impossible for two men mutually jealous to appropriate State funds. Mazarin resolved to put into force this opinion. On February 7, 1653, Servien and Fouquet were nominated jointly to the post. Till Servien's death in 1659 there were thus two superintendents of finance. In undertaking, in addition to his duties as procureur-général, the responsibilities of this new office, Fouquet was embarking upon a dangerous if lucrative course. The finances were in a hopeless condition. The social and political upheaval caused by the Fronde had not yet subsided; the struggle with Spain still continued. All the avenues to new loans were closed. The practical bankruptcy of the government in 1648 had destroyed its credit, and no one could be found willing to lend money. Only through the personal credit of Mazarin or of Fouquet could the State induce men to lend money. Such a method of without, the Ormée gradually realised that no help from either Spain or England was possible. Conti negotiated secretly with Mazarin, and at length a treaty was signed on July 31, 1653. The Dukes of Vendôme and Candale entered Bordeaux, Marsin, Lenet, and other partisans of the princes were allowed to depart, and measures were taken to assure the tranquillity of Bordeaux. Only the leaders of the Ormée were executed. Conti himself married one of Mazarin's gifted nieces, and the Duchess of Longueville, the evil genius of the house of Condé, made her peace with her husband, and on his death adopted a religious life in Paris. Mazarin was, however, not deceived by the appearances of loyalty in Bordeaux. He had rightly gauged the character of the inhabitants of the south west of France, and knew that the treaty lately made had only "covered up the flame and not extinguished it." He ordered Vendôme and Candale to take careful precautions against future outbreaks, and when a Spanish fleet appeared in November 1653, at the mouth of the Gironde, it met with no support.

Thus was concluded the long struggle of the Fronde. Over all France the royal authority had asserted itself. Internal disorder was rapidly disappearing before the almost complete extinction of Condé's faction as a power in the State. Henceforward the French nobles were no longer a danger to the State. They were employed in warfare or at the court, but had no opportunity of becoming great local magnates. Henceforward the parlement of Paris, shorn of its political functions, was forced to confine itself to its judicial duties, and to bow before the strong will of Louis XIV. Henceforward the principal government offices were filled by men who had sprung from the bourgeois class, or from that of the lesser nobles—men such as Colbert, Servien, Lionne, and le Tellier. Mazarin had successfully carried out and completed the work of Richelieu. The great nobles had forfeited all claim to confidence. Their selfishness, incapacity, and want of patriotism had been fully illustrated during the period from 1648 to 1651, and Mazarin was fully justified in crushing for ever the last efforts to introduce feudalism into government. Having destroyed the two Frondes, and having re-established order and the authority of the king, Mazarin was called upon to give to the reorganised monarchy the force necessary to conquer its external foes. From 1653 to 1659 Mazarin successfully accomplished that task, and placed the French monarchy at the head of the nations of Europe. His first duty was to drive the Spaniards from Champagne, to attack them in Italy and Catalonia, to take from them the seaports of Flanders, and finally to compel them to make peace. It was not till the Peace of the Pyrennees was signed in 1659 that Mazarin's work was accomplished.

Throughout these years Mazarin had exhibited diplomatic qualities of a high order. Richelieu would probably at certain epochs have acted in a more decided manner. That at the end of 1650, after Rethel, Mazarin should have immediately adopted energetic measures to establish his position is incontestable. He ought also, after the campaign on the Loire, in 1652, to have taken Turenne's advice and advanced boldly on Paris and proclaimed Louis XIV. king. Instead of such decisive action, he preferred negotiations which caused the battle of was far from showing any anxiety to close the bargain. He was busy fighting Condé and his partisans on the Loire, and hoped that a decided success in that quarter would render the acceptance of the English terms and the surrender of Dunkirk unnecessary. In April 1652 5000 English soldiers were assembled at Dover ready to be conveyed to Dunkirk. But Mazarin haggled and hesitated. He hoped that he could preserve Dunkirk by means of a relieving fleet, and that the English would not interfere with the French expedition. As Louis XIV's government still persisted in refusing to recognise the Commonwealth, Mazarin's hopes of English neutrality were destined to be disappointed, and a severe penalty was exacted for his failure to realise the true position of affairs.

Mazarin had indeed formed a plan, but none of the measures taken to relieve Dunkirk were of any avail. "God knows," he wrote to Estrades, "the trouble that I have taken during the last six months to send you help." There was only one way to relieve Dunkirk, and Mazarin only too late realised the vital importance to France of a friendly understanding with England. The Duke of Vendôme, the French admiral, was ordered to bring a fleet from La Rochelle, and, taking advantage of the temporary absence of Blake and the English fleet, which was at that moment in pursuit of some Dutch ships, to throw supplies and reinforcements into Dunkirk. Vendôme, however, found the execution of his task beset with difficulties. Near the islands of Ré and Oléron he was attacked on August 19 by some Spanish ships and by some vessels under the Count of Daugnon, one of Condé's supporters. Though victorious, Vendôme had to put back into La Rochelle to refit and revictual. Delays occurred, and at last it was decided to collect ships from Picardy and Normandy, especially from Calais and Boulogne, and with them to assist the besieged garrison in Dunkirk. On September 14 this hastily-equipped fleet, which numbered seven vessels and some fire-ships, set sail, and was met by some Spanish ships under the Marquis of Leyde, who had surrendered Dunkirk to the French in 1646. Before a battle could take place, the English fleet of fifteen ships under Blake arrived and captured all the French vessels except one, which escaped under cover of the night. The following day, September 16, Dunkirk surrendered to the Spaniards. Mazarin's hesitation, and ignorance of the character of Cromwell, and of the true position of affairs in England, had brought upon France a great disaster. He had carried on his negotiations too long, fancying that by waiting he could obtain English neutrality at a much lower price. In April he seems to have almost made up his mind to hand over Dunkirk as the price of an English alliance against Spain. Had he done so France would have gained enormously, and the treaty of 1658 with England would have been antedated by some five years. But as yet he had not realised the tenacity of Cromwell and of his Council, and he hoped to gain his ends at a cheap rate. As it was, he overshot the mark, and the Italian diplomatist only learnt after bitter experience that methods suitable for dealing with continental statesmen were inadequate for treating with a man like Oliver Cromwell. He had, however, learnt his lesson, and in December 1652 the French government formally acknowledged the English Commonwealth.

and in their defence Pascal in 1656 published his famous Provincial Letters. Though unable to make any adequate reply to Pascal's accusations, the Jesuits were sufficiently influential to secure their condemnation at Rome, and in 1660 the Provincial Letters were publicly burnt in Paris. In 1660 and 1661 many schools which were controlled by Port Royal were closed, and through out Louis XIV's reign Jansenism was barely tolerated. At the close of his life Louis fell under the influence of the Jesuits, and Port Royal was destroyed and its inmates banished. Mazarin's ministry thus saw the beginning of controversies which continued till the Revolution of 1789, but it must be remembered that Mazarin refused to destroy Port Royal and carry out a policy of extermination of the Jansenists, as was suggested to him. So strong, however, was the feeling on the part of the leading churchmen in favour of orthodoxy, that Mazarin showed no little wisdom in making the charge of Jansenism one of the principal points in his accusations against de Retz. Father Duneau, a Jesuit who was one of Mazarin's principal agents in Rome, had represented to Alexander VII the danger of allowing de Retz, who favoured the Jansenists, to remain at the head of the Paris diocese. In July 1655 the papal confessor, Father Sforza Palavicino, spoke freely to the Pope of the alliance between de Retz and the Jansenists. As not only de Retz but also many of his friends were Jansenists, Mazarin had good reason for expecting that the Pope would at once refuse to agree to the petition of the intriguing archbishop. But Alexander believed that de Retz had merely adopted Jansenism for political purposes, and declared that though de Retz might have taken money from the Jansenists, he had preached against the doctrines of Jansen. Lionne had already been sent as a special envoy to Rome, and he demanded that proceedings should be taken against de Retz. After innumerable delays Alexander appointed a commission to hear the charges against the Archbishop of Paris. But the conditions attached to the papal brief made it impossible for Mazarin to accept it. The Pope insisted that the parlement of Paris and the assembly of the clergy should sanction the proposed agreements (which included the appointment of a suffragan in place of de Retz), and Mazarin at once refused to allow any organisation in France to interfere with the supreme power of the king. The absoluté and despotic power in France, he said, resided in the person of the king alone, and no organisation in the kingdom could share it. In writing to the queen he declared that to negotiate with the parlement or the assembly of the clergy would be derogatory to the power of the king, and would reduce Louis to the position of a doge of the republic of France.

Lionne was recalled in 1656 and the proceedings against de Retz were dropped. Alexander, however, did little to aid the archbishop, who eventually resigned his post, while the suffragan regarded himself as holding his office from Louis XIV. De Retz received several abbeys, and in 1665 visited Paris, where he was coldly received by Louis XIV. He was nevertheless employed on missions to Rome, and during his later years wrote his famous memoirs.

Equally drastic was Mazarin's treatment of the parlement of Paris, and equally emphatic was his assertion of

CHAPTER VIII

THE LEAGUE OF THE RHINE AND THE PEACE OF THE PYRENEES

1658-1659

Capture of Mardyke—Death of the Emperor Ferdinand III—The Imperial election—Mazarin's intrigues—Election of Leopold—The League of the Rhine—The Treaty of Paris with Cromwell—Battle of the Dunes—The siege and capture of Dunkirk—Criticism in Paris—Negotiations with Spain—The proposed Savoy marriage—Treaty with Spain—The Peace of the Pyrenees—Marriage between Louis XIV and the Infanta arranged—The Northern War—The Peace of Oliva—Mazarin and Turkey—The English Restoration—A marriage arranged between Princess Henrietta and Orleans—Triumph of Mazarin's diplomacy

THE Treaty of Paris was not made a month too soon, for the campaign opened disastrously for France. The Spaniards captured Saint-Guillain in March and in June Condé forced Turenne to abandon the siege of Cambray. But after these failures success attended the arms of the French and English. Don John of Austria who commanded the Spanish troops, was incapable, Montmédy capitulated to the French in August, and Turenne not only captured Saint-Venant, but compelled the Spaniards to raise the siege of Ardres. Meanwhile, Louis XIV. had reviewed the English forces at Montreuil, and after a siege of four days Mardyke surrendered on October 3 to Turenne, who handed it over to his English allies. This success strengthened the good relations existing between Mazarin and Cromwell, though the cession of Mardyke to England called forth loud protestations from those who disliked the English alliance. At the same time complaints were made in England that Dunkirk had not been captured. Mazarin pointed out to Bordeaux that the English forces had arrived late, and that Spain had thrown reinforcements into Dunkirk and Gravelines. He urged that more English troops should be sent to defend Mardyke from the attacks of the Spanish forces. Till the following summer the combined English and French armies worked hard in strengthening their position, preparatory to an onslaught on Dunkirk.

Meanwhile, Mazarin was busy at Metz in conducting some delicate negotiations. The Emperor Ferdinand III. had died on April 1, 1657. In spite of the terms of the Peace of Westphalia, he had constantly assisted the Spaniards, and Mazarin had frequently protested against his violations of the treaty. In August 1656 Mazarin wrote to de Gravel, the French representative at Mainz, that the Emperor had not only supplied Spain with troops, but had lately resolved to send into Italy some 10,000 men to attack the Duke of Modena, the ally of France. Mazarin further remarked that the Emperor's conduct was due to the influence of the Spaniards. In 1649 Philip IV., King of Spain, had married Maria-Anna of Austria, daughter of Ferdinand.

'In consequence of this marriage,' said Mazarin, the Spaniards think they are masters of the imperial court, and therefore of all Germany.' "These facts," he continued, "should open the eyes of the electors and of all German princes, and show them the necessity of opposing without delay attempts to subject them to Spanish domination. Consequently, on Ferdinand III's death the electors resolved to shake themselves free from the influence of the house of Hapsburg. Leopold son of Ferdinand, had already been proclaimed king of Hungary, and it was necessary to combat his pretensions to the imperial throne. Mazarin even ordered Bordeaux to urge Cromwell to assist him in his policy and pointed out that Leopold had ratified his father's engagements to support Casimir the Roman Catholic king of Poland against Charles X., king of Sweden and England's ally. Not content with attempting to stir up England and Sweden to oppose the candidature of Leopold Mazarin, accompanied by Louis XIV. spent the months of September and October 1657 at Metz, engaged in negotiations with the electors. Already the German princes had shown that they did not consider that the welfare and independence of the secondary states in Germany were sufficiently guaranteed by the Peace of Westphalia. In 1651 the three ecclesiastical electors, together with the Elector of Bavaria, the Bishop of Munster, the Count Palatine, and the Dukes of Neuburg and Juliers, had formed a League of the Rhine for the defence of their common interests. On their side the Protestant princes had also formed a League, which included the king of Sweden, the Dukes of Brunswick-Limburg Zell, Wolfenbittel and Hanover, and the Laudgrave of Hesse-Cassel. Thus Germany was prepared for the diplomatic overtures of Mazarin, and ready to take steps to maintain the Peace of Westphalia.

Though suffering from gout, Mazarin showed the greatest activity. He carried on numerous sets of negotiations, and at the same time instructed Louis XIV. in the political condition of Europe, and explained to him the character of the interests of the various powers. Never had Mazarin's diplomacy been more active, never during his ministry had his hopes seemed more sure of fulfilment than at the close of 1657. Montmédy, Saint-Venant, and Mardyke had been taken from Spain, the English were co-operating with their French allies in capturing the maritime towns of Flanders, the Spanish influence at Vienna was destroyed. It remained for him to check permanently the power of the Emperor, and with the aid of England finally to crush Spain. The first of these tasks was accomplished in August 1658, when Lionne successfully united the two German leagues in the League of the Rhine, under the auspices of France. Mazarin had hoped to secure the election of a prince who did not belong to the Hapsburg house. The Duke of Neuburg, the Elector of Bavaria, and even Louis XIV. seem to have suggested themselves to his mind at different times. The Duke of Neuburg, however, did not prove a popular candidate, and the Elector of Bavaria was a weak prince devoted to the Hapsburgs. Gradually it became clear to Mazarin that the influence of tradition and an expectation of future favours by the electors tended to favour the choice of Leopold. Mazarin had little difficulty in changing his front. He declared that Louis XIV. had never aspired to the Empire, and he devoted his energies to so limiting the power of the new Emperor that he would be unable to help the Spaniards in their war against France.

On July 18 Leopold having accepted certain conditions imposed upon him by the electors, was elected Emperor. He swore to observe scrupulously the conditions of the Peace of Westphalia and not to interfere in the war between France and Spain. Before, however, the League of the Rhine was formed the young and warlike King of Sweden proposed to plunge into a war with the Emperor. Such a course of action, leading to general confusion in Germany, and probably to French intervention would have been conducive to the advantage of Spain and fatal to Mazarin's plans for narrowing down the struggle into one between Spain on the one hand and England and France on the other. The best means to defeat this project was to make a league among the German princes for the preservation of their independence. Charles X. yielded to the pacific advice of Mazarin and on August 14 1658 was formed the League of the Rhine, which was joined by the King of Sweden, six of the electors and other German princes. On the next day Louis XIV. joined the League, engaging with the other members to defend the settlement of the Peace of Westphalia. The signatories agreed to force, if necessary, the Emperor to carry out the promises made at his election. Mazarin had won a fresh diplomatic victory, and after events fully justified his efforts and the vast sums expended in bribery. According to Mazarin he temporarily ruined himself in buying the smaller German princes. For many years, however,

French influence was preponderant in Germany, and Louis XIV.'s position in Europe was largely due to Mazarin's formation of the League of the Rhine.

In uniting the German Protestant and Roman Catholic princes of Germany in the League of the Rhine, Mazarin had successfully affirmed the principles of toleration which he himself held, and which had been proclaimed in the Peace of Westphalia. He had, too, placed the Empire under a further obligation to France by saving it from the war which the kings of Sweden and Spain wished to stir up within it. He had carried out the policy of Richelieu towards Germany, and by his prudence and moderation had gained for France the gratitude of the German people. It was not till Louis XIV. allowed himself to be carried away by overweening ambition, and to attack Germany by his Chambers of Reunion, that the Empire united with the Emperor in resisting a policy which ran directly counter to that adopted by Richelieu and Mazarin.

During Mazarin's successful diplomacy in Germany, a fresh blow was being struck at the Spanish Bourbons. On March 28, 1658, a new treaty had been signed with Cromwell, and it was again distinctly laid down that the allied French and English forces were to combine for the conquest of Gravelines and Dunkirk. The campaign opened badly for France. Hesdin through treachery fell into the hands of the Spaniards; and owing to his rashness and imprudence the Marshal d'Aumont was defeated in an attempt to seize Ostend, and was himself taken prisoner. Mazarin, however, was by no means discouraged. With the king and Anne of Austria he proceeded to Calais, and pressed on the preparations for the siege of Dunkirk. The difficulties were immense. The Spaniards held Bergues, Furnes, Nieuport, and Gravelines, and were resolved to defend Dunkirk to the last. At the end of May the court moved to Mardyke, so as to be nearer to the scene of operations, and Louis XIV interested himself in providing for the welfare of the soldiers. On June 14 the allied forces won the battle of the Dunes and on the 23rd instant Dunkirk capitulated and was handed over to the English. Though Spain had suffered a severe disaster, Mazarin was violently attacked for carrying out the treaty with England and surrendering Dunkirk. In vain did Mazarin point out that had England and Spain united, the French cause would have seriously suffered, and that the alliances of Louis XIV with Sweden and Holland had proved insufficient for the overthrow of the Hapsburgs. Public opinion, however, moderated itself before the succession of victories gained by Turenne. That master of the art of warfare had seized Bergues, Furnes, and Dixmude in July, and in August 27 Gravelines capitulated. In the meantime Louis XIV had fallen so seriously ill at Mardyke that his life was despaired of, and cabals were formed for the overthrow of Mazarin. The cardinal, however, was well informed as to the existence and character of the plots, and exiled the conspirators. The king recovered, but on September 3 Oliver Cromwell died. He had proved an invaluable friend to France, and England had gained enormously from the war with Spain. The alliance between the two countries continued during Richard Cromwell's government, and the new Protector, in view of the numerous factions which existed in England, had every reason to adhere to the treaty with France. Meanwhile, the autumn brought fresh triumphs to the government of Louis XIV. On September 9 Turenne had invaded Flanders and taken Oudenarde. Leaving Don John of Austria in Brussels and Condé in Tournay, Turenne retired to the Lys, and occupied Menin and Ypres. The château of Commines on the Lys next fell, and Turenne busied himself in fortifying the conquered places.

The year 1658 had proved disastrous to Spain. She had been defeated in Flanders by the French and in the province of Alentejo by the Portuguese. Her position in the Milanese was threatened, and the English overcame her fleets at sea. Peace was absolutely necessary; but the pride of Philip IV. stood in the way of any settlement. To force the Spanish king to come to terms, and to induce him to consent to the marriage of the Infanta and Louis XIV., Mazarin had recourse to an artifice. He made formal proposals for the marriage of Margaret of Savoy with the young king, and with the court proceeded in October 1658 to Lyons, in order to meet the Duchess of Savoy and her daughter. The success of his plans was, however, for a time endangered by the infatuation of Louis for Maria Mancini, one of Mazarin's nieces. Anne of Austria, who had set her heart on the Spanish match, was in despair. The event bore high testimony to Mazarin's foresight, firmness, and diplomatic skill. On November 28, 1658, the Duchess of Savoy and her daughter arrived at Lyons, and almost simultaneously Antonio Pimentelli, a Spanish envoy, brought proposals for peace and the offer of the hand of the Infanta. On December 8 the Savoyard princesses left Lyons, and shortly afterwards serious negotiations traitor, or to permit Condé to enjoy a position in which he could again be a menace to the monarchy. Eventually it was settled that on condition (1) that Spain ceded Avesnes and gave Juhers to the Duke of Neuhurg, one of the allies of France, and (2) that Condé asked pardon of the King of France, he should receive his private estate, and he made governor of Burgundy and Bresse. To these terms Condé agreed, and became one of Louis' most submissive courtiers. Portugal was not included in the treaty, though France obtained an amnesty for the Catalans and Neapolitans who had sided with her.

Though the treaty of June 4 had provided for the marriage of Louis XIV with the Infanta, the terms of the arrangement were again fully discussed, Don Luis de Haro insisting that the princess should renounce her rights to the Spanish succession. Eventually Mazarin agreed to the renunciation, on condition that she received a dowry of 500,000 crowns, payable in three years. The articles of the marriage treaty were so drawn by Lionne that, if the money were not paid within the allotted time, the renunciation became null and void. The affairs of England were also discussed, and Charles II, who was present, endeavoured to secure the aid of France and Spain in effecting his restoration. Both Mazarin and Don Luis were in favour of the Stuart restoration, but Mazarin refused to take any part in the war between England and Spain, or to espouse the cause of Charles II.

Peace was now made, and France had established her superiority over Spain. The great work of Mazarin was finished and the policy of Henry IV and Richelieu was justified. Turenne, Fouquet, and others, however, were dissatisfied with the conclusion of peace, and were of opinion that the continuance of the war would have been advantageous to France. It was urged that Spain was so weakened that the conquest of the whole of the Spanish Netherlands could easily have been effected, and the Spanish monarchy dismembered. Mazarin, however, was right in concluding peace. France was exhausted, her finances in confusion, her people anxious for the end of hostilities. England, distracted by internal troubles, was no longer an effective ally; and had France persevered in her attempts to secure the Spanish Netherlands, she would probably have brought upon herself the active opposition of Holland and the Emperor. Mazarin, too, was anxious to bring French influence to bear upon the combatants in the Baltic and to end the northern war. It was also necessary to examine more closely into the condition of the finances and into Fouquet's administration.

One of the articles in the Treaty of the Pyrenees had contemplated the intervention of France or Spain as mediators in the northern war. Don Luis de Haro, however, showed no inclination to take any part in the work of mediation, and it was left to Mazarin to re-establish peace in the Baltic. France was indeed deeply interested in the work of pacification. Several of the allies of Louis XIV. were engaged in the war, and the Emperor had already taken part and violated the Treaty of Westphalia. Servien strongly urged that help should be given to Sweden, the ancient ally of France, and a valuable counterpoise to the power of the Emperor in Germany.

The northern war had begun in 1655 by the in-vision of Poland by Charles X. of Sweden. John Casimir King of Poland, who had married Marie de Gonzague Nevers, a French princess, lost the greater part of his kingdom, and Warsaw fell. Disregarding Mazarin's counsels of prudence and moderation, Charles X. attacked and made an enemy of Frederick William, Elector of Brandenburg while the Poles, taking advantage of this diversion, drove the Swedes out of their territory. Charles at once threw himself on Poland, and after the famous three days battle of Warsaw (July 28, 29, 30, 1656), again conquered the country. Alarmed at the rapid success of Sweden a coalition, including Russia, Poland, Brandenburg, and Denmark, was formed in 1657. Leopold of Austria, then King of Hungary, also allied himself with Poland and sent troops, while Holland was prepared to oppose the conversion of the Baltic into a Swedish lake. Menaced by this formidable league, Charles attacked Denmark and besieged Copenhagen. Unable to offer any adequate resistance, the Danes willingly accepted the mediation of France and England, and on February 28, 1658, made the Treaty of Roskilde, by which Sweden secured several provinces. War again broke out in the summer between Denmark and Sweden, and in August Copenhagen was a second time besieged. The projects of Charles X. included the annexation of Denmark and Norway to Sweden, and the occupation of Courland, Pilsen, and Dantzic. He would thus dominate the Baltic and rule over a powerful northern empire. Holland at once took alarm, defeated the Swedish fleet, and raised the siege of Copenhagen, while a new coalition was formed including Russia, Poland, Brandenburg, Denmark, and Holland. The Emperor Leopold encouraged the allies and sent them reinforcements.

Such was the situation in the north during the summer of 1658. Charles X. had ignored his allies, and his rashness had tended to alienate both France and England. But Oliver Cromwell was always guided in his policy to Sweden by the conviction that the Roman Catholic governments had entered upon a conspiracy against all Protestant states. He was also keenly alive to the importance of safeguarding English trade. Consequently Cromwell was easily convinced by Mazarin of the necessity of preserving the balance of power in the Baltic. Mazarin definitely proposed that France and England should unite to bring about peace between Sweden and Denmark, and between Sweden and the rest of the coalition. Cromwell at once sent a fleet into the Baltic to oppose Dutch attempts at aggrandisement. Unable to resist France and England, Holland joined them in urging peace upon Sweden and Denmark. During 1659 Mazarin never ceased his pacific endeavours, and almost simultaneously with the meeting of Mazarin and Don Luis de Haro a peace congress was opened at Oliva under the presidency of Antoine de Lumbres, the French ambassador in Poland. The proceedings were carried on slowly. The King of Sweden was ungrateful for the help given him by England and France, and obstinately refused to relinquish his schemes, while the Emperor was secretly doing all in his power to prolong the struggle and to drive the Swedes from their possessions in Germany. Imperial troops besieged Stettin, though in doing so they acted contrary to the terms of the Peace of Westphalia. No sooner was the Peace of the Pyrenees signed than Mazarin interfered energetically on behalf of Sweden. Various circumstances enabled him to bring matters to a successful issue. Spain refused to give any assistance to the Emperor, and the members of the League of the Rhine were stirred up by de Gravel, the French envoy, to protest against the Emperor's attack on the King of Sweden, who, as Duke of Bremen and Verden, was a member of the Confederation. Mazarin himself declared that if the Emperor's attacks on Pomerania were continued France would send her armies to the assistance of Charles X. It is impossible to assert that Mazarin's efforts to bring about peace would have proved successful had not Charles X. died in March 1660. Obstinate, ambitious, and full of wild schemes of conquest, Charles X. had nothing in common with Mazarin, whose advice he usually treated with contempt. His death at this crisis facilitated the conclusion of peace. The negotiations at Oliva were complicated by the fact that the Queen of Poland was a French princess who complained of the partiality shown by Mazarin for Sweden. Both Sweden and Poland were the traditional allies of France, and it was a difficult matter to arrange a satisfactory settlement. Mazarin's skill proved, however, adequate for the task, and on May 3, 1660, the Treaty of Oliva was signed. John Casimir renounced all claim to the Swedish throne. Livonia was divided between Sweden and Poland, and the latter state received back Courland Polish Prussia, and all towns in Pomerania lately occupied by the troops of the Elector of Brandenburg and the Emperor. This peace secured the independence of Prussia under the Great Elector, whose power was thereby greatly strengthened. On June 6, 1660, the Treaty of Copenhagen between Sweden and Denmark was concluded under the mediation of France, England, and Holland. Sweden gave up her recent conquests, but kept the provinces of Åland, Blekingie, and Scania. Mazarin's diplomacy had again been successfully asserted. While Sweden, the ally of France, still preserved her superiority in the Baltic, Denmark, Poland, and Brandenburg had accepted the mediation of the government of Louis XIV. The pacification of the north did infinite credit to the patience, perseverance, and sagacity of the cardinal.

The same year that saw the conclusion of the Peace of Oliva witnessed the departure of a French expedition to aid Venice in her war against Turkey, and to repress piracy in the Barbary States. The French ambassador at Constantinople had been insulted by the Turks in 1658, and without declaring war upon The Porte, Mazarin decided to avenge the insult by aiding the Venetians in their defence of Candia. The expedition proved a failure, and it was not till a few years later that French troops accomplished the end aimed at by Mazarin by aiding the Imperialists to defeat the Turks in the battle of St. Gottland.

Mazarin's last negotiations were successfully carried out, and proved beneficial to France. By a treaty signed on December 16, 1660, Ferdinand Charles, Archduke of Austria, on condition of receiving a large sum of money, renounced all pretensions to Alsace and the Sundgau (of which Altkirch was the capital), and it was at the same time settled that the county of Ferrette should also be ceded to France. In this satisfactory manner Mazarin succeeded in carrying out the stipulations of a clause in the Peace of Westphalia of the greatest interest and importance to France. On February 28, 1661, a few days before his death, Mazarin concluded a treaty with Charles IV, the Duke of Lorraine. The terms settled in the Peace of the Pyrenees were modified, and Charles IV was re-established in his duchy, though in close dependence upon France.

While engaged on these negotiations with the northern powers, with Turkey, with the Archduke Ferdinand Charles, and with the Duke of Lorraine, Mazarin had also been occupied in the south of France. There the court remained all through the winter of 1659-60, and during its sojourn at Toulouse several interesting events occurred. Mazarin secured for himself from the Duke of Mantua the duchy of Nevers, and at the same time gave the Count of Harcourt the province of Anjou in place of the government of Alsace, which he kept in his own hands. He also endeavoured to deal with the finances of the kingdom. Fouquet, the superintendent, had been denounced by Colbert and by Hervart, who had examined the accounts. Since Servien's death in February 1659, Fouquet's schemes had been unchecked. He spent immense sums upon the building of his château of Vaux le Vicomte, he employed spies to report to him the words of Mazarin and the king; he evidently wished to become the First Minister. The purchase and fortification of Belle-Isle seemed to presage a struggle between the magnificent Fouquet and the royal power. Fouquet's influence was undoubtedly considerable. Procureur général as well as superintendent of the finances, Fouquet had not only amassed a large fortune but had obtained for his relations and friends high positions in the church, the army, and the court. Liberal to extravagance, a patron of men of letters and artists, Fouquet had numerous friends in positions of trust. His power, wealth, and influence made him a dangerous man, and there is little doubt that he was prepared if necessary to stir up civil war. He had been useful during the years of stress, but he belonged to an order of things that was passing away. He had nothing in common with the views and position of such men as le Tellier, Servien, and Colbert. The future was with middle-class officialdom, with bureaucracy, and with centralisation. Fouquet wished to be the mayor of the palace. Mazarin was well aware of the advisability of ridding the government of Fouquet. In a memoir drawn up in October 1659 Colbert had painted Fouquet's faulty methods in the blackest colours, and had suggested sweeping reforms. But the principal obstacle to drastic financial reforms lay in the danger of shaking the credit of the government. The fall of Fouquet would increase the difficulty of obtaining money. This consideration may have decided Mazarin not to attack Fouquet. At any rate he had several interviews with the superintendent, and remained on good terms with him till his own death. It was left to Louis XIV. to carry out the suggestions of Colbert and to overthrow Fouquet and his system. Monsieur Chéruel, in his work on Mazarin's ministry, says that Nicholas Fouquet was with his brother the evil genius of Mazarin, and blames the cardinal for not acting energetically upon Colbert's advice.

During the winter and spring of 1660 the court remained in the south of France. The Fronde had been strongly supported in some of the southern districts, and the Duke of Mercœur, who had succeeded the Count of Alais as governor of Provence, had been compelled to use force in order to quell the sedition at Toulouse. Mazarin hoped that the presence of the king would allay all discontent and promote a feeling of loyalty, he was also anxious to improve the condition of the navy in the Mediterranean, and with that object visited in company with Louis XIV the important town of Toulon. At Aix in Provence Louis had received the submission of Condé, and on February 3 the ratification of the Treaty of the Pyrenees. Later in the month he and the cardinal stayed at Toulon, and on March 2 he entered Marseilles. As in the case of Toulouse, Mercœur had been compelled to have recourse to arms before he could secure the submission of the citizens. An expedition was about the same time sent to compel the governor of the town of Orange, which belonged to the house of Orange Nassau, to recognise the suzerainty of the King of France and to open its gates to his representative. From Marseilles the court proceeded to Avignon, Montpellier, and finally to Saint-Jean de Luz, where in June the marriage of Louis and the Infanta was celebrated. For the first time for many years Anne of Austria and her brother, Philip IV of Spain met on the Isle of Pheasants, and two days later, on June 6, the two kings had an interview. Louis XIV with his queen and court then returned to Fontainebleau, arriving on July 13. The state entry into Paris was not made till August 26, and was the occasion of great rejoicings. In the procession Mazarin's suite was equal to the royal household in magnificence.

First came seventy-two baggage mules, divided into three troops, and each troop adorned with embroidered silk and tapestry, the last troop clothed with coverings of scarlet velvet, on which were blazoned the cardinal's arms. Then followed twenty-four pages in rich liveries and on horseback, led by Mazarin's equerries, the Sieurs Fontenelle and Moreau. "Next came twelve Spanish jennets, accoutred in crimson embroidered velvet, and each led by two grooms. To these succeeded his carriages, seven in number, each drawn by six horses. The cardinal's private carriage was completely covered with goldsmith's work in silver gilt, and was surrounded by forty running footmen richly dressed, behind whom marched the Sieur de Besmo of Mazarin's body-guard." Mazarin, with Turenne, viewed the procession from a balcony, being too ill himself to take part in it. English affairs were during these celebrations engaging his attention, and demanded the exercise of all his diplomatic skill.

Before, however, the court had returned to Fontainebleau, the Restoration had taken place in England, and it seemed likely to be followed by a breach of the Anglo-French alliance. For some months Mazarin had been occupied with the consideration of the political situation in England. What was the true policy for France to adopt during the latter days of the weak rule of Richard Cromwell? The Treaty of Paris, made by Mazarin with Oliver Cromwell, had proved invaluable, but in accordance with the demands of the Protector, Charles II. had been forced to retire from France, while his mother, Henrietta Maria, remained, and had become a persona grata at the French court. While she looked forward to returning to England and to directing the policy of the restored monarchy, Charles II., Hyde, and the rest of his exiled friends held bitter feelings with regard to their treatment by the French government. In the early months of 1660 during his journey through Languedoc and Provence, Mazarin was compelled to watch very carefully the various revolutionary phases through which England was passing and to decide on the policy which France should adopt. A monarchical restoration in England was the ardent wish of Louis XIV and his court, but any overt action in favour of Charles II would rouse all the anti-monarchical sections in England and ruin Charles II's prospects. At the same time, Mazarin wished in view of the possibility of a restoration, to stand well with Charles, and in some measure to remove the feelings of hostility which that prince felt towards France and the ally of the Commonwealth. It was quite evident to Mazarin that the continuance of anarchy in England would disgust all lovers of order and contribute to a restoration; it was equally evident that the interests of Charles II would be best served by inaction on the part of France. Mazarin recognised that Monk held the key of the position. While that general was deciding on his future action Mazarin sent secretly to Charles II, who was then in Brussels, 100,000 crowns, and a promise of aid from France toward his restoration. The gravity of this blunder was at once apparent. Charles was doubtless shadowed by spies, but M. Chereuil, Charles Hyde and Orrmond with having divulged Mazarin's intentions. In any case Charles II's cause was for the time weakened and general sentiment prevailed in England at the notion of receiving a king through the agency of France. To destroy the evil effects of the publication of Mazarin's somewhat indiscreet action, Monk and the supporters of a restoration decided that Charles II. should reside in a country not dependent upon either France or Spain. Consequently the Prince proceeded to Brada, and on May 8, 1660, was offered the English Crown by the Parliament.

For some months after the Restoration France and England drifted apart, friction being caused partly by the continued residence in England of Bordeaux, who had been accredited to the Commonwealth, partly owing to the intrigues of Henrietta Maria, who worked with the aid of France to overthrow Hyde, the English Chancellor, her declared enemy. It was not until Bordeaux had been recalled, the triumph of Hyde assured, and the marriage of the English Princess Henrietta with Louis XIV.'s brother carried out in March 1661, that all danger of hostilities was averted.

From May 29, 1660, the date of the Restoration, to the end of the year Mazarin, among his other anxieties, had to face the possibility of a rupture with England. Charles II. opened the ball by refusing to receive Bordeaux, whom he accused of favouring the Commonwealth and of attempting to influence Monk against a restoration. In July Bordeaux left England, and Charles, realising that a war at that moment might shake his throne, made secret overtures to Louis XIV. and Mazarin.

The latter, anxious to leave France at peace, accepted Charles's excuses, and the Count of Soissons was sent with great ceremony to congratulate Charles on his accession. A proposal that Charles should marry Hortensia Mancini was swept aside by the cardinal, who thus a second time declined to allow one of his nieces to marry a king. On the contrary, he encouraged the project of a marriage between Charles and Katharine of Braganza. By one of the articles of the Treaty of the Pyrenees, France had engaged not to aid Portugal in her struggle for independence against Spain, either directly or indirectly. It was very doubtful if Portugal unaided could hold her own against the Spanish armies, and in bringing about a marriage between Charles II and Katharine of Braganza the French government was securing for Portugal a valuable ally. Since 1660 the relations between England and Portugal had been almost uniformly friendly. It was not, however, till 1662 that the marriage took place. In February 1661, shortly before Mazarin's death, Henrietta, Charles II's sister, arrived in France for her marriage with Philip Duke of Anjou and later Duke of Orleans. This marriage which was celebrated on March 31, had Mazarin's full approbation. It removed all causes of irritation between England and France and led to a close alliance between the two countries. Till William III's accession France gained enormously by this alliance. England never interfered seriously or for any prolonged period with the schemes of Louis XIV, Dunkirk was recovered, and the wisdom which guided all Mazarin's relations with England was again fully exemplified.

CHAPTER IX

MAZARIN'S DEATH, CHARACTER, AND WORK

Mazarin's illness and death—His will—Success of his diplomacy—Compared with Richelieu—A summary of his policy during and after the Fronde—His character—His artistic tastes and his library—His patronage of literature—His ignorance of financial matters—The services of Louquet—His employment of middle-class officials—Le Tellier, Servien, Lionne, Colbert—The intendants—Check upon the parlement of Paris—Mazarin's neglect of agriculture and commerce—His education of Louis XIV.—The debt of France to Mazarin—A great diplomatist.

THOUGH not yet sixty years of age, on his return to Paris in August 1660 Mazarin was an old man. In spite, however, of the gout and other infirmities, he never displayed more energy and activity than during the last years of his life. He carefully watched over the execution of the terms of the Peace of Westphalia, he contributed to the peace of the north by the Treaties of Cöpenhagen and Oliva, he maintained peace between France and England during a most critical period, and he brought to a conclusion most advantageous to France the Peace of the Pyrenees. During the autumn of the year 1660 he lived first in the Louvre, where Molière's plays L'Étoudi and the Précieuses ridicules were performed before him, and in November he moved to Vincennes. In January 1661 he was again at the Louvre, where on February 6 he narrowly escaped being the victim of a fire, which broke out through the carelessness of a workman, and in which many valuable pictures and tapestries were destroyed. He then moved to his own palace in the Rue Richelieu, where he was warned by his physician, Guénant, that his end was near. It was at this period that occurred the scene rendered famous by the account of an eye witness, the Count of Brienne, who was hid behind the arras. Determined to take a last farewell of his treasures, the cardinal in his fur lined dressing gown, stole into his picture galleries, and dragged himself feebly and wearily along. At each step his weakness forced him to stop, and Brienne heard him murmur, "Il faut quitter tout cela." As he went on he repeated, as he gazed first on one object and then on another "Il faut quitter tout cela." M. Chéruel throws doubt on the truth of the above story, as Brienne's memoirs are for the most part inaccurate. Such a scene, however, might well have taken place, for Mazarin's love of his Correggios, Titians, and Caraccis is well known, and to desire to see his favourite pictures was only natural. He now left the noise and bustle of the Palais Mazarin for the quiet of Vincennes, and on February 28 was able to sign the treaty with the Duke of Lorraine. It was about this time that he gave his famous last injunctions to Louis XIV. He counselled the king only to choose for church preferment men who were capable, pious, and loyal, to treat the nobles and magistrates well, though the latter should not be allowed to go beyond their regular duties; and especially to relieve the wants of the common people. Above all, he insisted on the necessity of the king governing without the aid of a First Minister. While recommending le Tellier and Lionne as faithful servants, Mazarin indicated Colbert as the man most suitable to preside over the management of the finances. The king should preside over the Council, and there should be no First Minister. On Louis XIV.'s refusal to accept all his fortune, Mazarin made a will leaving it to his relations. Charles-Armand de la Porte, son of the Marshal de la Meilleraye, who had married Hortensia Mancini on February 28, 1661, was authorised to take the title of Duke of Mazarin, and received a large portion of the cardinal's money and property, including the palace in Paris, the duchies of Mayenne and Rethelois, and, if the king permitted, the governments of Alsace and Brouage. The rest was divided amongst his Mancini and Martinozzi nieces, and his nephew, Philip Mancini, who also received his palace at Rome and the duchies of Nevers and Donziais. Besides his legacies to his relations, Mazarin left bequests to the king, Anne of Austria, the young queen, and the Duke of Anjou. He also left donations for certain hospitals and convents. All his papers were placed in the hands of Colbert, and have been for the most part carefully preserved. On March 9, 1661, Mazarin died, and was buried first in the chapel at Vincennes, and later, in accordance with his own wish, in the chapel belonging to the College of the Quatre Nations. The French Revolutionists, in order to show their contempt for the glorious history of their country, scattered the ashes of the cardinal, whose tomb is, however, preserved in the Louvre

Mazarin had certainly deserved well of France At the time of the Fronde the country was torn by civil war, invaded by the Spaniards, exploited by the nobles Many provinces were in revolt, and the central authority was practically non-existent While the parlement drove Mazarin into exile, some of its partisans were in treasonable correspondence with Spain In 1653, supported by the bourgeoisie, Mazarin had succeeded in establishing the royal authority on a firm basis He then set himself to recover for France that position in Europe which the Fronde troubles had for a time destroyed In 1661 France had, thanks to Mazarin's alliance with Oliver Cromwell, triumphed over Spain, and before the cardinal's death the way was prepared for the continuance of friendly relations with the restored English monarchy In 1661 France stood forth the first power in Europe Spain was rapidly declining Italy was divided among numerous separate states, some of which, such as Modena, Mantua, and Savoy, were allies of France In 1661, too, thanks to Mazarin's care, Cosmo dei Medici, the son of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, married Marguerite Louise of Orleans, and France gained a valuable Italian ally Closely connected by bonds of friendship with Sweden and the members of the League of the Rhine, France had nothing to fear from Germany when Mazarin's diplomacy had reduced the Emperor's power and prestige Holland alone was, not unnaturally, actuated by a hostile and suspicious spirit But Mazarin's diplomacy had left the Dutch helpless and without allies, to await the famous onslaught of Louis XIV in 1672

Though he had failed in one of the principal objects of his earlier foreign policy—the annexation of the Spanish Low Countries—he had by the marriage treaty between Louis XIV. and the Spanish Infanta prepared the way for future efforts in that direction. The German members of the League of the Rhine had also bound themselves not to permit the passage through their territories of any troops destined for the Spanish Netherlands. Mazarin had thus done all in his power to counteract the famous check which his diplomacy received in January 1648, when Holland made her alliance with Spain. A satisfactory balance of power had been established in Central and Northern Europe by the Treaties of Westphalia, Pyrenees, and Oliva, and France, triumphant over both branches of the house of Hapsburg, was regarded as the protector of the rights and liberties of the German princes. In 1661, then, France held a position of incontestable superiority in Europe. This position was due to the consummate diplomatic skill of Mazarin, supplemented by the marvellous military talents of Turenne and by the genius and trustworthiness of his agents, especially of Lionne, Servien, and le Tellier.

The question frequently presents itself, as one follows the fortunes of Mazarin and watches the effects of his policy, what would Richelieu have done under similar circumstances? That the internal troubles in France would never have developed into the movement of the First Fronde under Richelieu's hands may be taken for granted. But it must be remembered that Richelieu had years of experience in official life before he was called upon to undertake the duties of First Minister.

Mazarin was, during the early years of his ministry, hampered and opposed in every possible way, and instead of being supported, like Richelieu, by a king, he had to govern the country on behalf of a woman and a child. During the troubles and civil wars which occupied France from 1648 to 1653, it is impossible not to admire the skill shown by the Italian cardinal, and the way in which "though twice fallen and exiled, he speedily climbed up again with a cheerful and dauntless spirit." With the aid of Condé he vanquished the First or Parliamentary Fronde, and the Peace of Rueil was concluded. But the pride and ambition of Condé, backed up by the petits-maitres, led to fresh difficulties. Condé insulted the queen and Mazarin, and aimed at making himself all powerful. To check Condé's designs and to preserve the monarchy, Mazarin then allied with the leading members of the First Fronde, and Condé, Conti, and Longueville were imprisoned. He then suppressed disorder in Normandy, Burgundy, and Guienne, and defeated the Spaniards in the battle of Rethel. These successes, one would have expected, would have strengthened Mazarin's position. The very reverse happened. Thinking himself able to overcome all his enemies, Mazarin treated the powerful de Retz with contempt, and took no steps to nullify intrigues or to avert open attacks. The union of Orleans and the members of the First Fronde with the princes who composed the Second or New Fronde upset all his calculations, and he was compelled to leave France. From Bruhl, however, he directed with infinite skill the policy of the queen. The union of the two Frondes soon broke up. Between the ambition of Condé and the indolence of Orleans there was nothing in common. Condé, unconciliatory and rash to the end, refused, when Louis XIV.'s majority was declared, to lay down his ambitions, and plunged into rebellion. From this moment, when the country rallied round the king as the impersonation of the national greatness, Mazarin's fortunes improved. Gradually a complete revolution in public opinion was effected, and men realised the selfishness and want of patriotism of Condé and his followers. Supported by the bourgeoisie and by all those who preferred the interests of France to the triumph of a faction, and always using bribery to gain over the nobles and others, Mazarin brought about the ruin of both Frondes, and enabled the monarchy to prepare for a successful struggle against its internal foes.

That struggle was practically closed with the capitulation of Bordeaux in 1653, and during the ensuing years Mazarin, supported by the energetic young king, reduced the parlement of Paris to submission. The administrative system erected by Richelieu had withstood the attacks of both nobles and parlement, and was again set in motion. From the Conseil du Roi, or Council of the King, had been formed the Council of State, in which the ministers sat. Wielding, under the crown, enormous powers, the Council was supreme over the law courts and over all administrative bodies. The ministers could only advise, for all power rested ultimately with the king. The Fronde troubles had shown the incapacity both of the parlement of Paris and of the nobles to govern the kingdom. It was better that France should be under a monarchy than ruled by a narrow, selfish bureaucracy or by an anarchic, feudal aristocracy.

Mazarin's character has been the subject of much adverse criticism. The fact that he was an Italian rendered his position as First Minister in France always difficult, and made attacks on him popular. The language adopted towards him in the Mazarinades and by such men as de Retz was bitter in the extreme. Later writers, recognising the magnitude of his statesmanlike services to France, have awarded him fairer treatment. The Duc d'Aumale, in his admirable work on The Princes of the House of Condé, has noted some of the characteristics of Mazarin's complex character. "A great gambler, a scorner of danger, too greedy to be a good administrator he has views on foreign affairs, on diplomacy and war, the full extent of which cannot be derived from his despatches. He then notices Mazarin's "submissive language, his studied obscurity, his repetitions, his contradictions, extols his skill in negotiations, and declares that "an habitual craftiness led him too often astray in his relations with his fellow men." M. Cheruel, in his Histoire de France pendant la minorité de Louis XIV, sums up in an admirable manner the striking points in the cardinal's complex character. He draws special attention to his knowledge of European affairs, to his sagacity and presence of mind when unravelling the most complicated intrigues, to his perseverance, and to his patience and foresight in waiting for favourable opportunities for the execution of his plans. His indomitable ardour for work is proved by his voluminous correspondence. "Unfortunately, cunning, duplicity, and a sordid avarice were a serious drawback to Mazarin's good qualities." Mazarin's greatness was undoubted, though few of his contemporaries realised it. His correspondence contains ample proof of his statesmanlike qualities, and of his determination to place the country of his adoption at the head of European nations. Having attained this object of his ambition and perseverance, he is worthy to be ranked with Richelieu as a great minister. As a diplomatist he was unequalled. Sweden and Savoy were among his most faithful allies. When deserted by the Dutch he formed an alliance with England, with the happiest results for France. By the Peace of Westphalia he prepared the way for the League of the Rhine, and by the Peace of the Pyrenees for the absorption by France of a portion of the Spanish Netherlands. Never during the troubled years of the Fronde did his indefatigable activity cease or his perseverance give way to despair. Contemporary writers were, however, usually impressed by the faults of his character, by his intrigues and underhand methods of obtaining his ends, by his spy system and his avarice. Rarely has a great minister afforded to hostile pamphleteers so many opportunities for attack, and the Mazarinades show how ably his enemies took advantage of the defects of his character. They could not appreciate the value to France of the Peace of Westphalia; they had no wish to praise Mazarin's prudence, sagacity, and perseverance.

Though not fitted by nature to crush and destroy the nobles as Richelieu would have done, Mazarin's patience and flexibility proved equal to the task left him by his predecessor. "Mazarin," it has been said, "had a bold heart and weaker mind; Richelieu a daring mind and timid heart." Gentle and unassuming in demeanour, Mazarin was full of kindness and readily accessible to all comers Above the middle height, he was one of the handsomest men at the court. His hair was auburn, his forehead broad, his nose large, his beard carefully curled, his hands small and well formed Like the queen regent, to whom he was married, few who came into contact with him could resist the fascination of the good looking cardinal His mind was more subtle than that of Richelieu, and Italian like he preferred the refinements of intrigue to a more strenuous and resolute policy Instead of attempting to break his opponents, he consistently endeavoured to bend them to adopt his views A well educated man, his interest in art and literature was remarkable In 1646 he bought the Hôtel Tubœuf, on the site of which now stands the "Bibliothèque Nationale," and built the Palais Mazarin During the rest of his life he took every opportunity of enriching his palace with works of art, tapestry, and with all materials beautiful in design Clarendon tells us that, after the death of Charles I, Mazarin bought "rich goods and jewels of the rified crown, of which he purchased the rich beds, hangings, and carpets which furnished his palace in Paris" Though he missed the chance of buying Raphael's cartoons, he enriched his galleries with many valuable pictures collected from all parts of Europe His tapestry had a world wide fame, and though it was temporarily dispersed in 1651 by order of the parlement of Paris, it was restored to him later Mazarin was perhaps the best dressed man of his day, and his wardrobe was remarkable for the number and richness of the suits which it contained A born virtuoso, his cabinets contained many priceless jewels and other masterpieces of the goldsmith's art.

The enumeration of articles "in rock-crystal, amber, coral, and other precious materials, 'enclâssées dans l'argent vermeil doré,'" fill twenty-two pages of the Inventaire de tous les meubles de Cardinal Mazarin, drawn up in 1653 and edited in 1661 by the Duc d'Aumale. In the same work will be found lists of his furniture and a catalogue of his gilt and silver plate.

He was also a patron of literature and a lover of books. The great age of French literature was dawning, and he pensioned Balzac, Voiture, Descartes, Chapelain, Corneille, Bossuet, Pascal, Molière, Racine, Boileau, Madame de Sévigné, and many other writers who adorned the golden period of French literature, and who, now that order was re-established and that patriotism had conquered, were beginning to write. The movement in literary as in political history which is summed up in the term "The Age of Louis XIV." was fostered by Mazarin, who founded the Collège Mazarin, which afterwards became the Institut of France, introduced the opera, and supported the drama. Having secured in Naudé a competent librarian, Mazarin, like his contemporary Cardinal Francesco Barberini, who collected a splendid library, before the end of 1648 had acquired some 40,000 volumes, which he placed in his library for the use of the learned and for students. Naudé had traversed all Europe, in his own words visiting "Flanders, Italy, England, and Germany, to bring hither whatever is rare and excellent." By great good fortune this library escaped destruction in 1649, and again in 1651, when it fell into the power of the parlement. That body was willing to please the vandalism of the populace by attacks on the Palais Mazarin and its treasures.

Though all his collections were dispersed, his library escaped, and his books now form the Bibliothèque Mazarine, which is in the buildings of the Institut

Though Mazarin amassed an enormous fortune, he seems to have been ignorant of financial matters. Like Richelieu, he did nothing to reform the financial administration of France. Both cardinals failed as economists, and it was left to Colbert to carry on the work of Sully. During Mazarin's lifetime the privileged classes were exempt from the oppressive direct taxes, and the indirect taxes were assessed most unequally and unjustly. Emery Mazarin's first contrôleur général, was, like Calonne, skilful in staving off immediate difficulties and in obtaining money for the time. The sale of offices continued, and the practice of farming the indirect taxes was confirmed. The government thus was placed at the mercy of the financiers who assessed and recovered the taxes, and who made immense fortunes out of the taxpayers. Early in 1647 the State was practically bankrupt. Emery's édit du toisé had been withdrawn, and the taxe des auls and the édit du tarif yielded little. Among the causes of the opposition to Mazarin's irritation at the conduct of the farmers of the taxes was not the least. From 1652 to 1660 Mazarin found Fouquet invaluable for procuring loans for the State, while his selection of Colbert to manage his private affairs was an act the wisdom of which cannot be overestimated. Colbert fully justified the cardinal's confidence in his honesty and financial ability. The Brouage property which belonged to Mazarin was well managed, and proved a valuable source of income, and Colbert's efforts after economy were seconded by his master. Mazarin's correspondence with Colbert gives many proofs not only of Mazarin's avaricious nature, but also of his business-like way of looking at money. He had, it is often said, the instincts of a trader. Like Walpole in the next century, Mazarin was well aware of the value of money in politics. Throughout the Fronde enormous sums were spent in buying important politicians, and during his negotiations with the German princes at the time of the Emperor Leopold's election, the bribery of the electors and others was on a large scale. It must always be remembered that Mazarin, at critical moments in the history of France, was always ready to employ his wealth for the public good. During the German negotiations in 1657, the Treasury being well-nigh empty, he advanced the necessary funds, and on his death-bed he offered to leave his riches to Louis XIV. Over his avarice, which was great, his patriotism always triumphed. He is often criticised for handing over the finances to the care of Fouquet, of whose methods he was well aware. But it was not easy to see from what other quarter during the later years of Mazarin's life money could have been obtained. Moreover, Colbert, like a watch-dog, was continually on the alert. While he reorganised Mazarin's own estate with such success that Mazarin rapidly accumulated an immense fortune, he declared war upon Fouquet. Envious, alert, and capable, Colbert never ceased from 1653 to observe every action of Fouquet, and to note every suspicious circumstance. But Mazarin wisely continued till his death to employ the magnificent Fouquet, whose credit with financiers had been so invaluable to him during the stormy period from which he emerged in 1659. Though he sought for no opportunity of improving the internal wellbeing of France to a material extent, he at any rate bequeathed Colbert to Louis XIV.

In advising Louis to employ Colbert, Mazarin gave another illustration of his skill in choosing subordinates and his preference for the bourgeois class. Le Tellier, a hard working, prudent man, Servien and Lionne, able diplomatists, and Colbert, a skilled economist, were all men belonging to the bourgeoisie, and were all trained in the service of the cardinal. In 1643 le Tellier was placed at the head of the war department, and carried out his duties with vigour and diligence. He aided in bringing about the Treaty of Rueil, and during the absence of the court from Paris in 1650 he was specially entrusted to watch Orleans and to report to Mazarin. During Mazarin's exile in 1651 le Tellier, with Servien and Lionne, remained, with the exception of one short period, in Paris, aiding Anne of Austria, watching Orleans, and corresponding with Mazarin. On Mazarin's second exile le Tellier was entrusted with the management of all the State business, and till the cardinal's return was practically the head of the government. An astute, avaricious man, le Tellier was admirably fitted to occupy a high place in the State. Till 1666 he remained at the head of the war department, which he then resigned in favour of his son-in-law Louvois. Servien, the uncle of Lionne, had characteristics very different from those of le Tellier. While the latter was insinuating in his manners, and preferred the hyways of intrigue in order to attain his object, the former was straightforward and irascible. His direct methods proved useful in the negotiations immediately preceding the conclusion of the Peace of Westphalia, and Mazarin showed his appreciation of his merits by making him a secretary of state, and in 1652 joint superintendent of the finances with Fouquet. Always haughty and severe, Servien was a striking contrast to the corrupt and immoral nobles and officials by whom he was surrounded. He had little in common with Fouquet, and Mazarin in 1654 acted wisely in dividing their functions. He died in 1659, leaving France successful abroad and the work begun at Westphalia on the verge of completion.

Lionne is a more interesting figure than either le Tellier or Servien. During the stormy times of the Second Fronde he played an important part as one of Mazarin's principal subordinates in Paris. But it was as an ambassador that Lionne is most celebrated. He was entrusted by Mazarin with the difficult task of arranging matters with the papacy in connection with de Retz's claim to the Archbishopric of Paris; he took a leading part in organising the League of the Rhine, and in making the Treaty of the Pyrenees. Louis XIV. found his diplomatic skill of great use during the early part of his reign. Striking as were the diplomatic qualities of Lionne, they were destined to prove less remarkable than the financial skill of Colbert. But while Lionne's most celebrated successes belong to Mazarin's ministry, Colbert's career as a reformer and economist did not begin till after the cardinal's death. During the last nine years of Mazarin's life Colbert was constantly by his side. Colbert, like Lionne, always advocated a direct, vigorous policy. Like Richelieu he desired the adoption of firm measures with the prompt, and of stern methods towards all who resisted the king's authority. Though ambitious and often over severe and unjust in his decisions, Colbert was admirably fitted for the task of reorganising the finances of France. His jealousy of Fouquet was natural, and a struggle between the two systems of finance as represented by the two men was inevitable. Aided by these able subordinates, Mazarin, after the conclusion of the Fronde troubles, began the work of reorganisation.

First in importance was the re-establishment of the intendants. Richelieu had made the intendants permanent officials with wide powers, which extended over the whole kingdom, of justice, police, and finance. As the recognised channel of communication between the country districts and the royal Council, they at once roused the jealousy of the privileged classes, and one of the principal objects of the early Frondeurs was to procure their abolition. Though the nobles continued to derive their revenues from the provinces of which they were nominal governors, all real control over the provincial administration passed into the hands of the intendants, who, being middle class officials, had not the ambition of the noble orders. Mazarin thus continued and developed Richelieu's policy of making the intendants the basis of a powerful monarchical system. Under Louis XIV these agents proved efficient, it was not till the following century that the evils of over-centralisation became apparent. Equally effective had been Mazarin's treatment of the parlement of Paris. Its claim to be superior to the States General was heard no more, its attempt to wield political power was pushed aside. Its eminent president Molé had, till his resignation in 1653, endeavoured with some success to induce it to adhere to the terms of the famous royal declaration of October 22, 1652, though his successor, Pomponne de Bellièvre, in 1655 had attempted, but in vain, to regain for the parlement a recognition of its possession of political power. In 1657 the discontent of the parlement had been again allayed by a mixture of firmness and adroitness on Mazarin's part. When he died the cardinal had reason to expect fresh opposition from the parlement to the royal will, but Louis XIV. soon made it apparent that no resistance on its part would be brooked.

During the minority of Louis XIII. the parlement had asserted its right to be heard, but in 1641 Richelieu had issued an edict forbidding that body to take any cognisance of affairs of State. Its political power had thus been summarily suppressed, and it was ordered that all edicts were to be registered at once. Taking advantage of the irresolute rule of Anne of Austria, and of the consequent troubles of the Fronde period, the parlement regained its former position. But its triumph was only temporary, and it was not till the minority of Louis XV. that it again asserted its right to interfere in State affairs, and to represent the nation.

During the years succeeding 1653 Mazarin showed no interest in improving the internal organisation of France, or in developing the natural wealth and resources of the country. He neglected agriculture, commerce, manufactures, and the colonies. "If Cardinal Mazarin," writes Colbert, "understood foreign affairs, he was utterly ignorant of home government." Though by his foreign policy he had raised France to a great height of glory, he does not seem to have understood the meaning and value of good government. During the eight years following the close of the Fronde attempts were indeed made to improve the condition of French commerce. Mazarin took no sustained interest in the prosperity of trade or of the navy. In his later years, however, he was well served by Colbert, who urged the importance of measures for the development of trade, agriculture, and manufactures. Years had, however, to elapse before France could recover from the effects of the dislocation of her industrial life caused by her foreign wars and domestic troubles. Nevertheless, it was during Mazarin's ministry that Colbert made his first efforts towards that striking colonial, commercial, and manufacturing expansion which marked the first decade of Louis XIV's personal rule.

In 1661 Mazarin had restored order in France, but he was well aware of the importance of leaving the country in the hands of a firm ruler who would continue his policy. During the years between 1653 and 1661 he had paid considerable attention to the political and military education of the young king. In 1653 Louis for the first time had accompanied Turenne on a campaign. From that year, too, he was constantly with Mazarin, imbibing principles of conduct which he afterwards drew up for the instruction of his own son. Mazarin taught him to work hard, to learn self control, to accept advice from his generals and ministers. Owing to Mazarin's counsels, Louis, though remaining ignorant in literary matters, learnt to rule men, and, like Mazarin, to pursue with perseverance the objects of his policy. "It will depend entirely on yourself," Mazarin once said to the king, "to become the most glorious king that has ever lived. God has given you all the necessary qualities, and all you have to do is to employ them." Mazarin's expectations were not disappointed, and his constant care for Louis' education was amply rewarded. In 1654 Louis was present at the siege of Stenay, and in 1655 the firmness of his character was well exemplified in his treatment of the parlement of Paris. There is no doubt that Louis benefited immensely by his experience of camp life during the later phases of the Spanish war, and the lessons on the political state of Europe which he constantly received from Mazarin. On his death-bed the cardinal, in giving Louis good advice as to his treatment of his subjects, urged him to be absolute and not to govern through others. The fate of Fouquet, shortly after Mazarin's death, was an immediate and conclusive proof that Louis intended to carry out his late minister's final injunctions.

Mazarin's defects are obvious to the student of the Fronde period, but it is impossible to deny his consistent patriotism or the immense services which he rendered to France. He carried out the policy of Henry IV. and Richelieu, and permanently weakened both branches of the house of Hapsburg. At the Peace of Westphalia the Emperor was forced to grant independence, religious and political, to the German princes, and France gained Alsace, Brisach, and Philipsburg. The Peace of the Pyrenees signified the fall of the Spanish Hapsburgs from the high position which they had held in Europe since the days of Ferdinand and Isabella, and by that peace France secured Artois, Roussillon, and a portion of Flanders. The Fronde had unmistakably proved that monarchy was the only form of government suitable for or possible in France. Mazarin had steadily persevered in his task of curbing the parlement and of reducing the ambition of the nobles. Having assured the triumph of the monarchy, he spent the last eight years of his life in strengthening its position at home and abroad. The debt of France to Mazarin is immense. Like Disraeli he made his adopted country his first thought, and like Disraeli he eventually overcame the hostility caused by his foreign extraction. But while the English minister was not only a man of genius but also a man of action, and often delighted in dramatic coups, Mazarin was not a man of genius, but a diplomatist of the first order.

IMPORTANT DATES

1642. Dec. 5. Death of Richelieu.
1643. May 14. Death of Louis XIII.; Accession of Louis XIV.
 May 18. Mazarin confirmed as First Minister.
 May 19. Battle of Rocroi.
 Sept. 2. Overthrow of the Importants.
 Nov. 24. Battle of Düttlingen.
1644. Jan. 27. Edict of the toisé.
 Apr. 10. Congress opened at Münster.
 Aug. 3, 5, 9. Battle of Freiburg.
 Sept. 15. Innocent X. elected Pope.
1645. March. Reimposition of the toisé tax.
 May 5. Battle of Mergentheim.
 Aug. 3. Battle of Nördlingen.
 Aug. 14. Treaty of Brömsebro.
 Sept. 7. A lit de justice; the parlement submissive.
 Nov. 25. Treaty between France and Denmark.
1646. June 14. Naval battle off Orbitello.
 July. Bellièvre sent to England.
 Oct. 9. Capture of Piombino.
 Oct. 11. Capture of Dunkirk by Enghien.
 Oct. 29. Capture of Porto Longone.
 Nov. 21. Harcourt raises the siege of Lerida.
 Dec. 26. Enghien becomes Prince of Condé on the death of his father.

- 1660 Jan.—Mar Louis XIV. in Provence.
May 3. The Treaty of Oliva
May 29 Restoration of Charles II.
June 6 The Treaty of Copenhagen.
June 9 Marriage of Louis XIV with the Spanish
Infanta
1661. Feb 28 Treaty with Lorraine.
Mar. 9 Death of Mazarin

APPENDICES

A.—PRINCIPAL AUTHORITIES

Chéruel. Histoire de France pendant la minorité de Louis XIV.

Chéruel. Histoire de France sous la ministère de Mazarin. Mémoires of Cardinal de Retz, Madame de Motteville, Omer-Talon, Molé, Arnauld d'Andilly.

D'Aumale. Histoire des Princes de Condé pendant le XVI^e et XVII^e siècles.

Lair. Nicolas Fouquet.

Pascal. Provincial Letters.

Gardiner. History of the Civil War, and History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate.

[For a full account of the authorities, see the Bibliographie appended (1) to chapter i. vol. iv.; and (2) to chapter viii. vol. iv. of the Histoire Générale, par Lavissee et Rambaud.]

B—THE MAZARIN FAMILY

PIETRO MAZARINI = HORTENSIA BUFFALINI

C.—THE GENEALOGY OF LOUIS XIV. AND OF THE GREAT CONDÉ

D —THE PARLEMENT OF PARIS

THE four Sovereign Courts were —

- 1 The Parlement of Paris.
- 2 The Grand Conseil
- 3 The Chambre des Comptes
- 4 The Cour des Aides.

Of these the Cour des Aides had civil and criminal jurisdiction over cases connected with taxation, and the Chambre des Comptes had civil jurisdiction in financial matters referring to the royal domain, and the Grand Conseil decided questions of jurisdiction between the other Sovereign Courts

The Parlement of Paris was composed of the following Courts —(a) The Grande Chambre, where sat the First President and the four Senior Presidents, and where the lits de justice were held. Before it important appeals were brought, cases of first instance in which peers were concerned, criminal charges against royal and parliamentary officials, and charges of treason. (b) Chambre de la Tournelle, which took cognisance of less important criminal cases. (c) Chambre des Enquêtes, for less important cases of appeal, and for the preliminary examination of more important cases of appeal. (d) Chambre des Requêtes, which decided all less important cases of first instance.

The Parlement (1) was the supreme judicial court, (2) claimed the right of registering all royal ordinances, and the right of refusing to register. Such refusals were usually overridden by a lit de justice presided over by the king.

Provincial Parlements existing during Mazarin's ministry :—

Toulouse for Languedoc,	created in 1443.
Grenoble „ Dauphiné,	„ 1453.
Bordeaux „ Guienne,	„ 1462.
Dijon „ Burgundy,	„ 1477.
Aix „ Provence,	„ 1501.
Rouen „ Normandy,	„ 1515.
Remes „ Brittany,	„ 1533.
Pau „ Béarn,	„ 1620.
Metz „ The Three Bishoprics,	„ 1633.

THE END

Foreign Statesmen Series

Edited by J. B. BURY, M.A., Regius Professor of Modern History at Cambridge.

Crown 8vo: 2s. 6d: each

CHARLES THE GREAT.

By THOMAS HODGKIN, D.C.L.; Author of Italy and Her Invaders
&c. [Ready]

PHILIP AUGUSTUS.

By Rev. W. H. HUTTON, Fellow and Tutor of St. John's College,
Oxford. [Ready]

WILLIAM THE SILENT.

By FREDERIC HARRISON. [Ready]

PHILIP THE SECOND OF SPAIN.

By Major MARTIN HUME. [Ready]

RICHELIEU.

By R. LODGE, Professor of History in the University of Edinburgh
[Ready]

MARIA THERESA.

By Dr. J. FRANCK BRIGHT, D.D. [Ready]

JOSEPH II.

By Dr. J. FRANCK BRIGHT, D.D. [Ready]

MIRABEAU.

By P. F. WILLERT, Fellow of Exeter College, Oxford. [Ready]

COSIMO DE MEDICI.

By Miss K. D. EWART. [Ready]

CAVOUR.

By the Countess MARTINENGO CESARESCO [Ready]

MAZARIN.

By ARTHUR HASSALL, Student and Tutor of Christ Church,
Oxford. [Ready]

CATHERINE II.

By J. B. BURY, Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge.

MACMILLAN AND CO., LTD., LONDON